TURN HAIR DARK WITH SAGE TEA

If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody can Tell.

The old-time mixture of Sage Tea and Sulphur for darkening gray, streaked and faded hair is gradually being replaced by a new mother's recipe, and folks are again using it to keep their hair a good, even color, which is quite sensible, as we are living in an age when a youthful appearance is of the greatest advantage.

Nowadays, though, we don't have the troublesome task of gathering the sage and the mussy mixing at home. All drug stores sell the ready-to-use product, improved by the addition of other ingredients, called "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound." It is very popular because nobody can discover it has been applied. Simply moisten your comb or a soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, but what delights the ladies with Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound, is that, besides beautifully darkening the hair after a few applications, it also produces that soft lustre and appearance of abundance which is so attractive.

My Heart and My Husband ADELE GARRISON'S New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

The Way Dicky "Took" Grantland's Flowers.

My room was like a bower when little Mrs. Durkee had finished arranging the roses Major Grantland had sent me in such profusion. Every available place held the exquisitely tinted blossoms and their fragrance filled the air. In a closed room the perfume would have been enervating, but as the windows were all wide-open to the summer night it was simply reminiscent of my rose garden outside, the greater glory of which had departed with June.

Her fluffiness clasped her hands in childish admiration of her own handiwork when she had finished. "We could have a wedding in this room this minute if we only had a bride," she declared. "I don't know what we'll do if anybody else sends you flowers. There isn't a spot in the room left to put them except that table beside your bed which Mrs. Underwood shooed me away from."

I smiled at her characterization of Lillian's action a few minutes before. It rather aptly described it at that for Lillian, when Mrs. Durkee had suggested putting a bowl of flowers on the table nearest me had negated the proposition decidedly, stepping in front of the table with an oddly protective manner as she did so. I had been vaguely disappointed, for I love flowers, and especially when I am ill do I want them near as possible.

Claws That Show. "Well!" my little neighbor went on whimsically, "Major Grantland has saved me a lot of time and money. I suppose I should have stripped my garden in the hot sun and spent all my housekeeping money if he hadn't come to the rescue this way. Now I can wait awhile. This ought to save Dicky some mazzam, too. I wonder how he'll like it."

I saw Lillian stiffen slightly, noticed the little white lines at the corners of her mouth, which only come when she is angry. I was angry myself at the little woman mischievously malicious criticism, veiled though it was, upon Dicky's failure to bring me flowers before anyone else had sent them. But a second's reflection reminded me—for the thousandth time—that there is no more sense in getting angry at the little woman than there would be in punishing an adorable white kitten for scratching with her tiny claws. Both are equally irresponsible while Mrs. Durkee is wonderfully warm-hearted and genuine despite her feline propensities.

Dicky's Entrance. "Why shouldn't he like it?" Lillian demanded tartly. "Dicky is always delighted with any pleasure which Madge has." "Yes?" The rising inflection was daintily malicious. "He's a model husband, isn't he?" "Hush!" I exclaimed peremptorily. "I hear him coming." For my accustomed ears had heard his first step upon the staircase from the hall below. I have times I think my heart, too, in the extravagant fantasy of Tennyson would hear him and beat "were I a century dead."

He came up the stairs two steps at a time, burst boyishly into the room, a big box in his hand, then stopped as if he had been struck at the sight of the profusion of roses. For a fleeting moment his face was like that of a disappointed small boy, one who had prepared a Christmas surprise and finds it discounted. I longed passionately to call out to him to put my arms around his neck, but with Mrs. Durkee mischievously watching I could do nothing except smile at him. The next moment he had caught himself up, was saying heartily:

"By Jove! This is scrumptious! Somebody's beaten me to it, Madge. Who's the fairy godfather? Grantland, I suppose."

"Yes," little Mrs. Durkee answered quickly. "I should think you'd be terribly jealous."

"Oh, I am, fiendishly so," laughed Dicky, but I interrupted peremptorily.

"Dicky! Please, dear, show me what you have brought." His face brightened and he came over to the bed. "It isn't much," he said apologetically, "but I remembered how you loved the delphinium, and how disappointed you were when they didn't do well, so I've hunted all over creation to get these things."

He was opening the box as he spoke and displayed to my view the most exquisitely tinted blue and white delphiniums I had ever seen. Lillian's voice interrupted my rapturous admiration of them.

"Well!" she drawled. "I think this is about the time to produce the blue and white Chinese vase which I kept from Mrs. Durkee and make a place upon your table for these."
