Love's Crossroads Loom Large At Every Turn

By BEATRICE FAIRFAX.

A few weeks ago all of us were startled to read of the man who, flinging protective arms about his wife who stood gaunt in the railroad ties, stood facing death in the form of an oncoming locomotive.

"I won't leave you, Mary," he said.

And the ring of it had something of heroism and love bigger than self.

It takes a lot of courage to face a fire-snorting, powerful, onrushing car of the juggernaut. Courage like that has something of grandeur.

There's no getting away for a breathless moment of reverence for the sheer magnificence of the thing.

"Would I be brave enough for that?" we say—"brave enough to face annihilation with some one I love?"

But there is one braver thing. To face the agony of farewell, to endure the awful knowledge that parting has come, to bear the hideous crushing out of life in the being dearest in all the world—to bear it and not share it for the sake of the "stern-faced daughter of the voice of God—DUTY." That is the supreme thing. That is the thing that requires the greatest courage of which the human heart is capable.

For every human decision has its "other side." The man who loved his wife enough to die with her had three children. And the duty was to love them enough to live for them.

There were three helpless kiddies at home. Those three kiddies were flesh of the man's flesh. They had come into this world without any volition on their own part. They hadn't been given any choice about the mere matter of being born and living or not. And the man who had thrust upon them, all unasked, the gift of life was responsible for the life he had summoned from the infinite.

There's no way of getting out of duties and responsibilities. And the sternest duty in all the world is the duty of parent to child. What a child does its parents doesn't start to be a finite thing until the parent has created the debt as it created the child.

To make a supreme decision all in a moment is a terrific mental test.

Everywhere a Cross-road. Everyday life is full of moments of strain. We keep coming to crossroads and having to decide down which way we will go. When there's plenty of time to think things over, to weigh the pros and cons, there isn't much excuse for deciding stupidly. Some unconsidered element of chance and change may render a well-thought out decision null and void. But other things being equal, when there's time to decide the well-balanced brain makes the best choice.

The big moments, however, come unheralded. Instant action, quick decision, an unerring choice, a right weighing of values are required. How then shall we make the right choice?

The best preparation for a crisis is to live every moment of every day as well as we know how. When the little decisions have to be made, we must make them sanely and wisely. Mentally and not emotionally. Honestly and not dramatically. Then when a crisis comes automatically the brain trained to weighing and measuring and basing decision on actual values is pretty likely to formulate its decisions like that in the infinitesimal moment it has for adjustment.

Emotion, the love for the dramatic, the telling gesture, are tempting to all of us all the time. And the wrong mental habit will lead us to make first one and then another decision with our mind's eye on the wrong thing.

Unconsciously we play to the gallery of our own self-esteem, of other peoples' opinions, part of the time. And they don't count, they haven't any real value.

"The best preparation for a life to come, is to live well every moment here and now," said a wise man.

By the same token, the best preparation for tomorrow is to conduct today sanely and wisely.

The Best Way. The best insurance against making wrong decisions when decisions have to be made instantly is to make able decisions when there's plenty of time to "dope them out."

Don't ask yourself agonizing and unanswerable catch questions like this one:

"If my wife and mother were both drowning and I could save only one, which would it be?"

Instead of that, prepare yourself to take care of both of them. And help your wife in her youth to train to take care of herself in case life demands that of her.

I'm using this well worn idea for its symbolic value. This is what that is:

Women Advisers to the Industrial Conference

Among the women advisers to the first industrial conference of the league of nations just held at Washington, D. C., is Senator Marie Hjelmer of the Danish Parliament.

Senator Hjelmer, who has recently been in New York for a hurried sight-seeing trip, reported to the National American Woman Suffrage association in the name of the Danish Woman Suffrage association, one of the 26 national associations affiliated with the International Woman Suffrage alliance of which Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt is president.

Although Danish women have had parliamentary suffrage since 1915, owing to war conditions there were no general elections in which they took part until last year, when several women were elected to Parliament.

Senator Hjelmer, for several years a member of the municipal council of her small city, not Copenhagen, was elected last year to the Landsting, the upper house of the Rigsdag. Fru Hjelmer is president of the Danish Women's Suffrage association was at the same election, seated in the lower house, the Folketing. Both women have recently been instrumental in leading to victory a woman's equal pay bill.

Although she is one of the law makers of her own land, Fru Hjelmer's position in the industrial conference in Washington was that of adviser only. By the terms of the league of nations treaty, women are to have equal opportunity with men to hold offices even in the secretariat, but as a matter of practice they are still far from any such equality. The only mandatory arrangement, which ensures women's presence on the league's labor program is the one providing for women "advisers."

"Many of the foreign delegations," Fru Hjelmer reports, "have brought such women advisers with them to Washington. Spain has one, Belgium has one, and Scandinavia is especially strong in its representation. Fru Betzy Kjelsberg, factory inspector from Norway, is the only woman thus far reported, who is actually appointed to the position of delegate to the assembly of the league of nations, but she also is here at the labor conference as an adviser to the Norwegian group.

Miss Gerstin Hasselgren is adviser to the Swedish delegation." Fru Hjelmer has the gift of being silent in several languages. She has that poise which marks older civilizations, calmness of speech and deliberateness of judgment. One thinks of her with her careful, gentle manners, her habit of listening and her remarkable power of concentration on the business in hand, as a woman representing a very conservative constituency. She belongs, however, to the Danish radical party, which would probably be translated into Anglo-Saxon as a liberal party.

Her principal preoccupation has been with bills asking for better protective laws for women and children. In addition to the equal pay bill, the women's admission to offices bill, Fru Hjelmer has in her year of parliamentary service also worked for a great school commission, for educational reform, and for an improvement in the law for illegitimate children.

Hasn't a Nose, but Can Smell

A fish hasn't a true nose, but it can smell. Experiments have proved this, says a scientific writer. What is more, these experiments have proved that odor travels through water just as it does through air. Anglers have laid so much stress on the need of exciting a fish's interest by the look of food that the effect of scent has been overlooked.

A shark will bite at a hook containing a piece of fat pork that does not look like any kind of fish that swims the sea. Why, then should the trout be expected to be interested only in an artificial "gray hackle," it may be heresy in angling to suggest that a "fly" should smell like a fly. These scientific experiments show how large a part smell plays in the food pursuit of fish. Bait, such as small crabs, was found and eaten by the fishes three times as rapidly when the shells were broken. Bait, placed inside a gause bag, was smelt within three minutes of being lowered in the water, and almost at the same time all the fishes began nibbling at the bag.

When cotton was stuffed into its so-called "nostrils" the dogfish would seldom observe the food that came near them, says the "Fishing Gazette." If the fish saw other dogfish eating, those whose nostrils were stuffed up would join them and take a share in the feast, but when kept by themselves they starved in the midst of plenty.

Several scores of species were experimented with, and in practically all cases it was determined that fishes are possessed of a sense of smell, though their olfactory system is as yet but little understood.
