KRUG ESTATE IS LEFT TO WIDOW; VALUED $110,000

Frederick Krug Indicates Desire for Final Disposition of Holdings Here in Will.

The will of Frederick Krug, pioneer Omaha brewer, was filed in county court yesterday, together with a nominal statement that the estate is worth upward of $100,000 in personal and $10,000 in real property. It is said the real value is more than $500,000.

The will leaves the entire estate to the widow, appointing Albert Krug, a son, executor and Isador Ziegler legal advisor.

The final disposition of the property is indicated by a statement of the division of the estate provided Mrs. Krug had not survived him.

In that event the home at Twentieth and Leavenworth streets, with the furniture and automobile, was to be given to Lena Krug, unmarried daughter. She was also to receive 18 shares in the Fred Krug Products Co. and 166 shares in the Cassel Realty Co. Other children and grandchildren were to receive the following:

Albert Krug, 200 shares in Fred Krug Products company and 466 shares Cassel Realty company; Mrs. Anna Wiedman, daughter, 18 shares in Fred Krug Products company; 166 shares in Cassel Realty company; Mrs. Tillie Becht, daughter, 20 shares in Fred Krug Products company and 168 Cassel Realty company; Jake Krug, son, 20 shares Fred Krug Products company and 168 shares Cassel Realty company; Jeannette Louise Krug, granddaughter, 18 shares in Fred Krug Products company and 166 shares Cassel Realty company.

The Cassel Realty company is the holding company for the Krug real estate.

No provision is made for Katherine Metz Krug, because she inherited the shares of her deceased father, William Krug.

My HEART and My HUSBAND

Revelations of a Wife

What Madge Read in Lillian Underwood's Protest.

I watched Mr. Walter's retreating figure until he was quite out of sight, then went slowly upstairs to my room where Lillian was busy at work at her drawing board.

From the lawn outside came shouts of laughter from Marion and crows and gurgles of delight from Junior, whose Lillian's young daughter was teaching to walk without support from anyone's hand. Mother Graham, like an anxious old hen, hovered over the proceedings, and Katie kept straying out jealously from the kitchen whenever she could feign an excuse for doing so.

"Well, Madge," Lillian looked up from her drawing board, cheerily. "It strikes me we might just as well have come to board here instead of at Mrs. Durkee's for the summer. Marion seems to have taken up her permanent abode wherever Junior happens to be, while I'm sitting in your pocket all the time. I really should have gone over there today now that you're able to be around, but I just cannot work there these days."

I cast a quick glance at her, but she had bent over her drawing again and her face was in shadow. But I guessed her meaning, knew that she did not care either to meet Major Grantland, who I knew from Mrs. Durkee was an almost daily caller at my motherly little neighbor's, or to listen to the chatter of Her Fluffiness concerning his supposed interest in me.

But, of course, I could not comment upon an unspoken meaning, and besides I had things of more importance to discuss with Lillian. Preceding everything else, however, I wished to assure her of the joy it gave me to have her and her little daughter so near me.

"Do you know what Dicky's comment would be upon your recent remarks?" I asked smiling.

"Slathers of Work."

"No," she retorted. "What?"

"That you talk like a can of pork and beans," I replied. "The idea of your darling to go anywhere else than here if you can possibly manage to put up with us."

"So?" she replied mockingly, leaning back and looking at her work critically. Then she swirled her initials in the corner and rose from her chair hastily.

"Praise be to Allah, that's off my mind!" she said devoutly. "But"

POLICE STILL IN DARK ON CLUES TO HAYDEN ROBBERY

Detectives Admit $63,000 Store Theft Completely Baffles Them.

Detectives have practically given up the case of the robbery of two safes at Hayden Bros. store, Sixteenth and Dodge streets, Saturday night, when three yeggmen escaped with $63,000 worth of currency, gold and jewelry, after binding two night watchmen and enjoying themselves with a lunch and music.

From the time of the discovery of the robbery on Sunday morning, when the engineer of the store found the watchmen bound and gagged, detectives say they have had no clue on which to work. "As a last resort, the arrest of the yeggmen might likely be made through the cashing of some of the stolen checks or the pawing of the jewelry," Chief of Detectives Dunn stated yesterday.

Ten detectives have been working on the case. The only articles left by the yeggmen in the wake of their escape were blown detonating caps and a broken bit out of an electric drill that had been used to bore holes in the doors of the vault.

A standing reward of $15,000 for the arrest and conviction of the three yeggmen if one-third of the loot is recovered, and a proportionate amount for the arrest of any of the yeggmen, has been offered by Joseph Hayden, owner of the store.

What's on yours?" she asked quickly after a searching look at me. She evidently had been too absorbed in her task to gaze critically at me before.

"Many things," I answered evasively. "Come on down in the garden with the children. You've been cooped up here nearly all day."

"But I got slathers of work done," she retorted with the evident joy of accomplishment which is always hers. "However, I don't mind admitting that I would like some air. Wait just a minute until I get some of this dust off."

She slipped out of her big studio apron, appearing fresh and trim in white linen. And after swift ablutions and equally swift rearrangement of her wonderful silvery hair, she descended the stairs with me, a picture of mature beauty so striking that I wished involuntarily for Robert Savarin's appreciative artist's eyes.

Hearts Unchanged.

The thought brought in its train another which had often occurred to me in these summer weeks since Lillian and her young daughter had been domiciled at Mrs. Durkee's. Beyond the bare statement that Robert Savarin was resting and recovering his strength at the home of his sister, Mrs. Cosgrove, in the Catskill mountains, I had not heard her mention the artist's name and I was reasonably sure that she had received no letters from him. Indeed, I had corroborative evidence of my conviction from gossip little Mrs. Durkee, who asserted confidently one day that "Not even a picture postal card has come from the Catskill mountains since they've been here."

Had Lillian and the man who loved her so devotedly come to a definite parting of the ways because of my friend's Quixotic determination to respond to Harry Underwood's real or fancy need of her?

I felt a sudden hot resentment at the thought, even though I respected the unyielding stoic determination of the woman to whom life had meted such long martyrdom of her affections.

Marion called to us joyously as we neared the rose garden where she and Junior were.

"Oh, mother! Auntie Madge!" she caroled. "Junior can walk all alone. See! He can come seven steps to me."

She stationed herself a short distance from the baby, extended her arms and called softly sweetly.

Junior looked at her steadily as he scrambled to his feet. Then with baby perversity he sat down flat again, and defied all the little girl's efforts to get him up again. Flushed, disappointed, evidently at her wits' end, she cast a quick glance at her mother, then swiftly unfastened a gold locket with its thin chain about her neck, and swung it before the baby.

"Come baby," she coaxed, "you may have this if you walk to Marion."

I saw Lillian put out a quick protesting hand, then draw it back again as quickly. I knew the trinket to be a gift of Robert Savarin's to the child he idolizes, realized from the look on my friend's face that she involuntarily resented any other use of it, realized something else that no matter what the present relation between my friend and the lonely mountain artist, my friend's heart was still unalterably his.
