story of a victim of catalepsy undergoing a narrow escape from prenature burial, and recently an Engish daily told of a nurse who was found in a forest between Berlin and Potsdam, apparently dead from an overdose of veronal, and who was placed in a coffin ready for burial. Just before closing the coffin the undertaker discovered to his horror that her heart was beating and removed her at once to a hospital, where she was given electrical treatment, under which she finally opened her eyes and uttered a few incoherent words.

Such authenticated incidents cause the reader to ask if there is not some infallible test of death known to the medical profession.
