straight and narrow?' Pyschologists teach that a criminal has an instinct to do wrong. and that he fears not the moral evil in an actual offense itself, but rather dreads the probable result of law violation-the penitentiary.

Hence, the professional criminal's ways are wary. He eludes capture by the slightest trick; he leads po-lice on hot trails of burglaries and the more general of crimes; he withholds his identity when appre-hended, if possible, and is continually plaaning a next move, especially so if escape from prison at any time is a probability. The criminal lives a life solely for himself.

Some of the cleverest brains in police work, for the detection of the criminal, are constantly on guard for the apprehension of notorious and clever police characters, roaming the country at large, ever ready to blow a safe, commit hold-up or
