Dear Miss Fairfax. Omaha Bee: I wish you would tell me what you think about the question I am going to ask.

I think a whole lot of her, but about a month ago when she had a birthday and I gave her a cedar chest and now her mother called me up to see her, and when I got there she started to talk to me.

Another question is—Do you think us two know our own minds? I'm a good workingman and I think I know what I'm doing, because I've made my own way for about the last eight years.

The girl said she would consider it the same as an engagement ring, and is that all right?

Regardless of what the mother or anyone else says, you and the girl are not engaged to each other unless you have talked it over yourselves and decided it is mutually agreeable.

What Jack Did, and How Harriet Braithwaite Made Things Right With Katherine.

Jack did not leave us long in doubt as to his actions. With chafy face and eyes in which humiliation and remorse had replaced anger, he strode up to Dr. Braithwaite and said in low yet clear tones: "Will you permit me to apologize for making an unmitigated ass of myself a few minutes ago?"

It was his hand that was outstretched now. The big physician's right hand shot out and grasped it firmly.

"Do you think I don't understand the state of your nerves, lad?" he asked, carefully avoiding any intimation of—indeed, he suspected any—personal reason for Jack's former boorishness. "The Lord knows I've seen enough of 'em this last year. Forget everything about it, and—Dick, where the devil do you keep those cigars of yours? You're not getting stingy in your old age are you? Come on Spencer, suppose we men take a turn and a smoke in the garden while the women are fighting over the proper way to bring up Junior?"

Katherine's Eyes Blaze. So skillfully did he manage things, with Dicky ably seconding him, that in another minute the four men had disappeared down the garden path, and we four women—Mother Graham, Harriet Braithwaite, Katherine and I—were left gazing breathlessly at each other, thankful beyond measure that an ugly situation had been successfully straightened out.

Mother Graham, of course, knew nothing of the "real inwardness" of the little drama which had just been staged. What she suspected we had no means of knowing, for like the thoroughbred old gentleman she is, she forebore to make any comment upon what she had seen. But I shrewdly suspected that when

There is an explanation due you, but it is I, not Margaret, who should make it. Will you listen to me without comment, and forgive me, if you can, afterward?" Katherine inclined her head gravely, but did not speak. As her head fell, I held my breath. How could a proud woman like Harriet Braithwaite endure making the confession of her own weak imaginings which she must contemplate.

When she spoke, however, it was with such simplicity, such rare understanding, such royal apology, that Katherine, teared eyes of women, capitulated long before she had finished. With tears trembling upon her eyelashes, she moved involuntarily toward the elder woman, and the story was finished with the three of us standing close together with intertwined arms.

"I told your husband this same story, child," Harriet Braithwaite finished, "and I believe I was able to remove that horrible obsession jealousy from his brain. I—I think perhaps you may be—happier—because of this little ruse we have played."

"I am sure of it," Katherine said softly, kissing her, then she raised her eyes to mine, and there was full forgiveness and understanding in their depths. (Continued Tomorrow.)
