National C. of C. Secretary So Tells Omaha Business Men -Positive Action Planned at Once.

Income and excess profit taxes are largely responsible for prevailing high prices in this country, according to John N. Van Der Vries, secretary of the Central district of the United States Chamber of Com-merce, who spoke at the Omaha Chamber of Commerce at noon yes-

The United States chamber will take some action at its next annual meeting in Washington on this taxation problem in Mr. Van Der Vries' opinion, which will eventually result in the deflation of prevailing prices. "The war has had the direct result of bringing the business men of the country and the government closer together," Mr. Van Der Vries said. "Twenty years ago the interests of business in this country were not considered by the government and when business interests needed some special legislation groups of men were sent secretly to Washington, where every political wire available was pulled in an effort to secure the ends of interests repre-sented. The result was the formation of combines detrimental to the government and the public.

Suspicious of Business.

"When President Taft took his office he found that for 20 years prior to his administration 75 per cent of the legislation on the statue books at Washington was legislation un-doing legislation which favored some group or section of the country.

"This sort of legislation made the government suspicious of business, and until recently the government and the public have not realized that it was not representative business which had secured favorable class legislation."

The solution of the present railroad problem is attributed largely to the efforts of the United States hamber of Commerce by Mr. Van Vries, who declares that the Esch-Cummins bill is largely founded on the principles advocated by a representative meeting called by the United States chamber.

My HEART and My HUSBAND By ADELE GARRISON

What Madge Felt Forced to Tell Lillian.

Lillian came back from the city in the week following little Mrs. Durkee's accident, but hurried away again the same day with only the briefest of reassuring words.

"Everything's going all right," she said in answer to the inquiry in my eyes-I knew better than to put into words any query as to her mental anguish. "He's an unusually slippery animal to trace, but we've got a good line on him. He hasn't bothered you or Alice Holconibe "Not me," I said, "and I heard from Alice only last night, so I am sure he hasn't been there."

"I thought not," she returned. "I don't think you'll ever be annoyed with him but once more, and at that time you'll be the sacrificial goat staked out in a trap, with Mr. Wilsey acting the part of the tiger, while I take the role of the mighty hunter.

"You know what usually happens to the goat," I smiled, yet with an inward tremor at ever again meeting the man Jake Wilsey, even un-Lillian's efficient protection. "I won't let the tiger eat you," Lilliam promised. Then she hesitated, looked at me speculatively.
"I wonder if you could get away to cover just one little angle of this thing," she said. "You wouldn't have to be gone but 24 hours. Could you leave Mrs. Durkee?"

Madge Remembers. "Oh, yes, I could manage that! But Mother Graham would be wild with baffled curiosity. "I'll fix that end of it," Lillian romised. "All I have to do is to tell her that I am summoned to Washington on some government business, and that I have asked you to find out something for me at Sag Harbor. That's gospel truth, too, for I have a piece of government work on hand, came in last week, which has taken so much time that I haven't had the chance to pick up all the threads concerning Wilsey. But if you'll go to Sag Harbor, see Mrs. Ticer, and ask these questions of her it will help matters along materially."

"I'll take that first train in the morning. It will be quicker than I dare drive a car, I won't need anybody with me, and there won't be so much danger of a breakdown. There are plenty of taxis at the other end, so that I can reach Ticer's quickly."
"Good! Now memorize these, and I'll trust to your ingenuity to ask them casually." She put a paper into my hand, looked over my shoulder until I had read the questions, answered the single explanation I asked concerning one of them, then hastened to her room to make her brief prepara-tions for her trip to Washington.

A Shock. He had answered our letters of invitation with an almost pathetic eagerness of acceptance, and I was sure that the main reason for both his acceptance and his first note concerning his pictures was his de-sire to see Lillian. With the thought of Harry Underwood's mocking face as I had last seen it, I felt a sudden-surge of hot indigna-tion at the barrier Lillian had built up between herself and the lonely artist who leved her so loyally.

"Of course, Auntie Madge," the child said obediently, and hurried out of the room. Neither her moth er nor I ever ask the child directly to leave the room when we have things to discuss which require secrecy. But she has been trained to obey instantly the various little subterfuges which we employ and which she understands perfectly. I knew that she would not return to her mother's room until bidden. When the door closed after her turned to Lillian nervously.

"Dicky has invited some one you know for a visit, and I thought you ought to know it, for he will be here when you return."

It was my nervousness, not de-sign, which had made me phrase my announcement so awkwardly, but the result gave me a glimpse into the depths of my friend's soul not often vouchsafed me. She turned white and put her hand out grop-ingly as if blind.
"Not Harry!" she gasped. "He hasn't come back, has he?"

There was absolute terror in her voice. I rushed to her and grasped her hands. "No, no, no!" I said. "Some one
