My HEART and My HUSBAND By ADELE GARRISON

The Note Esther Walters Brought

A felt my heart thumping against into the house, and from thence rapidly to the front door, for I wished to anticipate the girl's ring.

My mother-in-law, who fears the night air, was reading in the living room, and the aroma of a good cigar floating down the staircase told me that my father was enjoying himself in his customary after-dinner fash-ion, smoking and reading while lying comfortably upon the special-ly made couch, which is one of his pet pieces of furniture, and which he always carries with him whenever practicable.

No other reason for the girl's call sprang to my mind but the one ob-sessing thought that her brother had sent her with some message concerning Kenneth Stockbridge which he did not dare to bring himself. I reflected grimly as I found myself trembling visibly when I laid my hand upon the door knob that I was becoming not quite sane upon the subject of the Stockbridge case, and I tried to persuade myself that when I had greeted the girl, who

I turned a fittle faint, for the words brought vividly to my mind what I had tried to forget, that Kenneth Stockbridge with whom I had worked for a year, and whom my dear friend, Alice Holcomb, loved with the whole strength of her wonderful soul, would so soon face the ordeal which might end in the most

That's no fib either," she added childishly, giving me a loving little hug. "I always want to see you."

"We'll Be Careful." "And I you, Esther," I replied farmly, returning her embrace, and drawing her through the door into the hall. "I am so glad you could run over between trains," I added in a louder voice for the benefit of my mother-in-law. "You've been neg-lecting me shamefully lately. Come upstairs to my room and let's have a good old-fashioned talk."

If I had hoped to blind the dread of the men rising before me I whispered the tense wishmother-in-law to their being nothing out of the ordinary in Esther's coming, one glance at her as we passed through the room with a hurried greeting to her would have disappointed me, for her lips were pursed with suspicion, while the same feel-ing glanced darkly from her eyes beore she returned their gaze to her when I had greeted the girl, who had been a favorite pupil of mine in the Bayview high school, I should find that she had simply come over between trains to make me a little call.

But when I had opened and closed the door behind me I saw by the anxious look in the flower-like face gazing into mine that my premonition of the reason for her coming had been justified.

"Oh, Mrs. Graham!" the girl began in a low voice. "Quick, hide this."

She slipped me a little note which I promptly tucked into the bodice of my gown. Esther drew a deep
