

Salvation Army Flivver Takes Joy to Many Poor In City's Dark Corners

A car, filled with provisions, dashes madly about Omaha each day, visiting the sick and unfortunate. The car is piloted by Adj. H. B. Northrup, in charge of the Salvation Army Relief corps, and Adj. Alne Nelson of the Scandinavian branch of the Salvation Army.

A reporter for The Bee entwined himself among the provisions in the rear seat of the decrepit little car yesterday afternoon. His misgivings were well founded, for the car dashed away at a breakneck speed, through the thickest downtown traffic.

Adjutant Northrup, as he attempted to pass a speeding street car and narrowly avoided a collision, "I don't know why we aren't arrested for speeding unless the policeman know why we are hurrying and try not to see us."

At the First Stop.
The first stop alone, however, seemed to justify the speeding of the driver.

The car drew up before a large, unpainted frame house at 722 North Nineteenth street. The two adjutants dismounted, secured several pounds of food, including beans, flour and potatoes, and entered. They were greeted cordially by a stout woman, apparently the landlady of the house, who told them that "grandmother was doing nicely since they last called."

They ascended to the second floor, then climbed a narrow winding stairway to the attic. Here they found, living in a corner of the barren loft, a white-haired old lady. She was a cheerful old lady, and greeted them with a kindly smile. She hurried to rearrange a pile of rags which she used for a bed, insisting that she had known they were coming.

Now, when I'm old and broken, I am glad to find even such a place as this to live."

90 Years Old and Alone.
"I am four-score and ten years old, my boy," she continued. "I have a daughter on a ranch somewhere and a son somewhere else. I don't know where. The landlady lets me brook what these good people give me downstairs, but it sometimes takes me an hour to climb those winding stairs again."

make, so with a word of prayer the visitors departed.

The next stop was at 3214 Charles street, a tiny frame house, windows curtainless and side unpainted. There was an air of squalor about the place, and the adjutant hastened to explain that the little woman within cared for seven children, sending them to school.

abated Mrs. Talbitzer told of a bitter struggle to keep her children in school. One had died, she said, but she was determined to keep the others well and educate them. This she was doing on $25 a week, earned by her husband at the Western Motor Car company, and with the assistance of the Salvation Army.

Provisions were distributed at several other homes, where the need was as apparent as in the "first cases," as the adjutant called them. The little car then dashed to the Salvation Army Rescue home and Maternity hospital at 3824 North Twenty-fourth street, where the remainder of the provisions were left. Adjutant Lillian Ness, matron at the home, said although the home was limited to 10 patients, there were at the present time 30 cases. Without the aid of the relief department the home could not continue, she said.

Since then gave some appalling statistics, among them the fact that during the last year there were 21 girls under 18 in the home of which 18 became mothers. Many of the girls were well educated and came from the best of homes, she said. She led the way to what she termed, "babyland." There were 36 babies, some crying, some cooing. One was colored, another Indian, and the remainder white. One had been born but 24 hours before.
