My Dears:

"ONE can be too smartly dressed in London." This is a remark made by a leading socie's woman and it very well expressed the attitude of the high-born English woman. A gentlewoman in London has not the same ideas about dress as the Parisienne of the same class. A Londoner is both conservative and conventional. She may admire on others the extreme Parisian styles, but she does not adopt them.

The Londoner standard of dress is more stately. It runs to costly fabrics, real laces and rare furs. The woman of quality dresses according to her station, which is designated by the traditions of her family. Thus it is rarely that her personal taste is expressed absolutely in her dress. She is very much controlled by the standard of dress established by the leaders of her family. She thinks rather of the chicago of the day or evening wandering delightedly through its airy rooms.
