HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

Is Dicky, Not Rita Brown, Really to Blame?

I do not think I have ever had a greater struggle to keep my temper than I had at Rita Brown's insinuation that Maj. Grantland was to be my companion in my morning tour of Washington. That there was malice in her raillery I well knew, but there was something more than malice in the expression of her face as she adjured me to call her early, that she might be my "lady chaperon."

Avidity, crass and undisguised, shone in her brilliant eyes. I knew as well as if she had told me in so many words that she meant to do her utmost to attract the attentions of Hugh Grantland, and this without feeling the slightest attraction toward him. I knew that in her shallow soul she jeered at him for his lack of drawing room tricks, that she knew nothing, cared nothing, for the wonderful qualities of brain and heart which the man possessed. There was but one thought in her mercenary mind, and that was the wealth which Hugh Grantland possessed, the material advantages he could and would give the woman he married.

The very perception of her intention, however, made it possible for my self-control to win in the battle my indignation was waging with my poise. That she was clever enough to guess that I had fathomed her thoughts I was sure—indeed, I suspected that she counted not only upon my knowledge but upon the distinctly feminine weapon which that knowledge put into her hands. For she knew that I knew what construction she would pretend to put upon any resentment of mine toward her. She was capable of making apparent to all our little circle that any coolness of mood upon my part—no matter what the provocation—was based upon my dislike to see any other woman find favor in the army officer's eyes.

With a mental anathema against the fate which had thrown the girl into the enforced intimacy of my railroad journey, I put down my temper with a firm hand. I even managed a careless smile of my own as I retorted:

Rita Brown Chooses.
"I'd be delighted to have you, but I'm afraid you'll be disappointed. There'll be no one more romantic than my father in my rambles." "Tell that to the porter!" she gibed. "Can't put me off that way, dear heart. Well, here's where the race is to the swift! Night, night." She had been rapidly undressing during our colloquy, and as she spoke she slipped into a fetching pair of rose silk pajamas and dove into the lower berth. Drawing the blankets up over her, she laughed up at me in gamin fashion, then turned over on her side and pretended to drop off into immediate slumber.

Even though my angry amazement at her impudence I couldn't help smiling at the exquisite irony of the situation in which I found myself. Both my father and Hugh Grantland had secured drawing rooms for me in order that I might travel comfortably. Mrs. Durkee was escorted in one and Rita Brown in the lower berth of the other, while I, perforce, must either climb to the upper berth or accommodate myself to the narrow confines of the couch.

I chose the latter immediately.

After bathing my face and hands and braiding my hair—little functions which Rita Brown had entirely omitted, to my intense disgust—I slipped into its surprisingly comfortable bed. There I lay awake for some time wondering at the curious mental makeup of a girl who could do the petty little trick she had just performed, and just as I was sinking into slumber a sudden unpleasant thought jerked me back into wakefulness.

The Answer?

What had Dicky told her about the drawing room arrangements, anyway? Perhaps she was guilty of nothing but an exhibition of natural selfishness. As I thought over I realized that no doubt my husband, with his inordinate desire to be royally courteous to everybody, had given her to understand that drawing rooms were provided for everybody, and that the fact of our sharing the same stateroom was a mere coincidence.

It was just one of Dicky's little ways, and I chided myself for the jealous resentment that the thought of it gave me. But try as I might I could not banish from my mind the contrast between my husband's attitude and that of Major Grantland. As I finally slipped into slumber I told myself drowsily, but no less bitterly, that Dicky was considerate of every one in the world but me, while Major Grantland—

Guest Towels.
In marking the guest towel a monogram is favored, but a single initial is entirely proper. The old English letter is oftentimes used, but a newer note is seen in a letter formed like a diamond with ornaments at either side giving the impression of an ornament. The old-fashioned cross-stitch is much in favor. Whether the marking is a single letter or a monogram, it should be placed in the center of the towel and within three or four inches of one end, so that when the towel is folded in three folds the embroidery will show as the towel hangs on the rack.

Why Persecute Your Feet?

No part of the body "serves" more steadily and continuously than the feet. While active they must also support the entire weight of the body. Then why do we add persecution, knowing that it alone causes most of the foot ailments? We cannot crowd the feet, pinch the toes, bind the muscles, retard circulation and expect to have normal, healthy feet. Nature gave us feet to use and not abuse. Ground Gripper Shoes are shaped as nature shaped our feet. They give utmost freedom to every required muscle movement—they support the weak places as nature intended—they build up sound, rugged, healthy feet, which never annoy.
