Does Soap Cleanse Things?

(Copyright, 1920. By the Wheeler syndicate, Inc.)
Even savage tribes know that the ashes of some plants, when mixed with water, produce a smooth, slippery feeling and materially aid the cleansing properties of the water itself. This is due to the fact that the ashes contain soda or potash, both of which are excellent for washing, but are likely to injure the skin or eat into the garments which are being cleansed. But whether we use ashes, as did our ancestors, or cake soap, as we do today, the principle is the same. The alkalis cut into the dirt and grease and make it easy for the water to rinse it

In the modern manufacture of soap, fats—glycerine, in combi-nation with what are known as "fatty acids"—are placed in large iron vessels and mixed with some kind of oil, usually palm oil, but tallow, olive oil, cottonseed oil and others are also used. A little caustic soda or potash is then added and the mixture is boiled until nearly all the oil or fat has combined with the soda or potash. In the manufacture of toilet soap, common salt is then added. This has the effect of separating the water and glycerine from the soap and the latter rises to the surface, where it is skimmed off. partially dried out and either cut or pressed into cakes.

The addition of water to one of these cakes of soap results in the formation of what we know as lather—soap in a semi-liquid state—and this, seeping into the fabric or applied generously to the hands or other parts of the body, dissolves grease or dirt of various kinds, permitting it to be easily rinsed away by the application of water.
