"I'm down in this section for a little while," he returned. "I've brought some friends over from Aberdeen, the Grahams. I believe they are to have your cottage." "Oh, yes!" Mrs. Lukens replied. "I've received two or three telegrams within the last few hours from Mr. Graham about being ready to receive their party, one of whom is ill. Came near not getting them, too, for they were addressed to 'Mrs. Watkins.' But as they were signed Graham, and everybody knows everybody else's business down here, the telegraph operator guessed I was the one meant. And so there wouldn't be any misunderstanding I signed Watkins to the one I sent back,"

"That explains things," Maj.
Grantland said. "I wondered if it might not be you after all. But I common liquid arvon from any drug Mrs. Graham's room is—she has had

Look here-I'll walk ahead of you a mite, and you follow me slowly around the house. It's all lighted up and ready." She was down the steps and skimming ahead of the car like a young girl, although she must have been over 60 years old. I had an impression of resistless, nervous energy triumphing over age and possible ill health, and wondered anew at the dynamic force pos-sessed by most women of the older generation. I am afraid when the women of our generation are old we will make by comparison but a poor showing.

What Does Dicky Think?

Maj. Grantland entered the car again, started it, and with its powerful speed reduced to a mere crawl we moved down the driveway in the wake of Mrs. Lukens. Before us, as we turned around the corner of the house, seemed a wall of trees and shrubbery, but Mrs. Lukens darted to an opening in it, and Maj. Grantland deftly guided his big car wondering eyes it seemed scarcely

"I'll Back Mrs. Lukens."

"I can tell Mrs. Graham's room as soon as I see it," my mother-inlaw put in, the acerbity of fatigue in her voice. "There were three bedrooms described in the plan the woman sent us. One of them is a sun parlor and sleeping porch combined, with two beds. My son and daughter-in-law are such fresh air cranks that such a room is the only place for them. I will take Richard Second in one of the others, and Spencer can take the one that's left. How do you do?"
The last remark was addressed to

Mrs. Lukens, who was at her side as soon as Maj. Grantland had helped her from the car. My father had taken the sleeping child from her, and followed her immediately.
"If you'll just show us the bedrooms." With these words my efficient mother-in-law took charge of the entire situation. As she disap-peared within the house, Dicky chuckled.
