

Scraps of Love Letters Picked Up—Then Sold

Missives Not Tied Up in Pink Ribbons Find Way Back To Mills and More Paper.

Love letters never die. Even if they are torn up and thrown away, instead of being tied in pink ribbon and saved for reading on rainy days or for evidence in a breach of promise suit, they continue to live, thanks to the waste paper industry. For love letters and business letters, too, and street car transfers, checks, and railroad tickets all are fished out of waste baskets and melted into some new form of fresh, clean paper.

Thus, the candy box that holds the gift to the young lady around the corner may have been made from the very letters she sent you while on her vacation next summer. True, there is an equal chance that the tender missives have been pounded into pulp and made into a shoe box, or a container for soap, of course, if you are an old-fashioned and burn your correspondence, that's different, and you, or whoever cleans up your scraps, loses the cent a pound that even the most trifling messages are worth.

How It Goes.
Several tons of waste paper are collected in Omaha each day. Newspapers, old records, books, magazines, wrapping paper, scratch paper from the school room, all this and more are grist to the waste paper mill; and all reappear in the form of some necessary paper box or another.

The litter from the offices of the tall downtown buildings is usually haled or put in sacks every two weeks, so fast does it accumulate. In the nineteenth story of the Woodman of the World building, six tons a month is sold to the paper stock company. The biggest customer of the waste paper buyers is a railroad headquarters here, which averages 25 tons a month. Its check for last month was $700.

Howard G. Loomis, manager of the Omaha National Bank building, keeps a man at work four hours each day hauling up the paper waste. "In the old days this used to be one of the prerequisites of the janitor," says Mr. Loomis, "but the job has grown too big. We sell three and a half tons a month, which is a half amount to about 42 tons. The price just about pays the wages of the hauler, so there is no profit in the work, but that this is the easiest way to get rid of refuse that is a fire danger if left to accumulate."

Always Picking Up.
The waste paper business, of course, always is picking up, but it is best in the fall, when new goods are coming in and the jobbers and retailers and ultimate customers all have a great many things to unwrap. Christmas wrappings alone are a big item.

The Salvation Army, churches, schools and missionary societies, are among those who make a practice of selling old papers. Children sometimes use this means to get spending money, just as the other generation sold bottles and iron. Magazines bring a better rate than most other waste, and in large quantities bring a cent a pound. Newspapers are worth from 50 to 75 cents 100 pounds, although this rate cannot be paid by the collectors who call on householders. They act as middlemen and have to sell their accumulated stocks at that price.

Then It is Shipped.
All the waste paper collected in Omaha is shipped to the mills by one firm, the Omaha Paper Stock company. In a large building near Eighteenth and Leavenworth streets, a force of men and women, whose payroll amounts to $1,200 a week, are employed in sorting and baling the waste. Nothing of value other than paper is ever found. The string, typewriter ribbons and scraps of office lunches are among the things to be taken out.

On an average, a carload of paper is shipped east every two days. There are no mills here, but the entire output is taken by paper mills in Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan. To keep the smallest mill going it is said the supply must equal 75 tons a day, and Omaha's supply amounts only to 10 tons.

A box making company here has a mill in Illinois which supplies it with strawboard and chipboard, the latter made up from scrap paper, for making corrugated and other kinds of boxes. Its waste cuttings, together with the scraps out of the waste baskets are shipped back at the rate of a carload a week, to be turned into paper once more.
