The Bee's Short Story

Camouflage. By NEVA FINLEY VERNES.

I still contend that I had no other choice in the scandalous affair, and with Heaven as my witness, I had no intention of "landing him" as my designing cousin Warren shamelessly infers. Explicitly speaking, 'twas the hand of fate alone that lured me from my contented bachelorette state, with a good position—but really, I am getting ahead of my story.

I began two years ago, one moist August night, when Cousin Warren dragged me to a dance at the Country club. As a business woman, sensibly inclined, I had little time for such frivolousness, and the insanity of dancing lured me to shreds. After two or three arduous rounds, Warren was only too glad to sit them out with me.

"There is absolutely no hope for you, Allie," cried Warren in despair. "Why can't you at least be civil to the boys?"

"This is my affair," I retorted coldly, dangling my program.

"Who would think such a radiant creature as your own fair self can prove such a little iceberg?" he mourned dolefully.

"I didn't come here to be insulted!" I snapped, extending my claws and goodness only knows what I might have said to the second lieutenant, if he had not come up to us. With her was a second lieutenant, rather a good-looking sort, one of those popular heart-breaking he-vamps, by far too attractive to possess sterling qualities.

"I was silent as Warren and I drove home under the pale stars.

great beyond. I stared into his face, wild-eyed. Then it suddenly dawned upon me that Richard Sommer had taken me unawares. I simply booted!

"I came with a message from Warren," he stammered, mopping his brow. "The cause of my impromptu intrusion, Warren and Miss Ackers are driving to Redland before the dance and request that we go along. They want us to stand up with them."

"What?" I gasped. "They're getting married, you see?"

"I'm not sure," I replied over my shoulder. "You'll have to make yourself at home. The biscuits are in the oven."

"I'm not sure," I replied over my shoulder. "You'll have to make yourself at home. The biscuits are in the oven."
