Camping Out Is An Affair of the Heart

There are those who consider September and October the most perfect months for life in the open, despite the larger numbers who enjoy camping out during the summer season.

Camping out is an affair of the heart. Refreshment and inspiration are its rewards. The camper goes because he wishes. He does not camp for physical comforts, or for mere entertainment. The person who is satisfied with the summer resort need not go camping out.

Not every one, then, may camp out. One should go only when the spirit moves, and should be sure that the spirit is more than curiosity or a longing for fun and change. Camping out is not mere idleness if the effect is to be worth the while. One must have very distinct objects in view.

The love of nature is the fundamental requisite. The camper must want to know nature as it is, not as he would have it. He must be content with wind and rain and heat, as he is with blue skies, cool breezes and pleasant fields. He must be sympathetic with weather and plant and beast. The complaining one would better stay at home.

The largest gain in camping out is the communion of the individual heart with nature. There is time and opportunity to sit in silence. Even though the camper may not be conscious of it, he comes into relationship with elemental forces, with new exuberance, with things and events that are beyond his knowledge and control. All these things force him to new points of view, teach him his proper subordination to the world in which he lives, and deepen the best convictions of his heart. For the time the spoken language is of little significance. There are impulses that go deeper than words. He communes with great verities, not with men. The best campers are those who go solitary or with a very few congenial spirits. Thoreau lived alone at Walden.

Go camping out with a specific purpose, and choose your place and your companions to that end. Those who have knowledge of some special branch of natural history would get a great deal from such a vacation. The outing is direct, definite, purposeful. There need not be serious study, but there should be personal interest in some of the things that are to be seen, for thereby does one come into sympathy with his environment. These purposes are as varied as the tastes of men. Every person may find something in the open to interest him; and, if he is worthy his craft he is a student of nature, and goes to see and to feel. The mountains, rocks, streams, clouds, farming plants, forests, fish, insects, birds, mammals—in these subjects every person can find a point of vital interest.

Of camping there are two types. One is a temporary transference of the home life to the open. This is really living out of doors. This practice reaches its highest perfection in countries that have long rainless seasons. The other type of camping out is that which is best characterized by the term "roughing it." This is intended in this writing to be a part of the great outdoors. He desires to be as free and wild as the winds that blow.

If one is to get the most from camping out, he should go away from cities and towns. The genuine purity of nature cannot be maintained at a fashionable resort or on the outskirts of a settlement. The camper may well imitate the life of the Indian. Let him prepare himself with a very simple, light outfit, and then search out some remote or neglected corner of the country—and there are many such. The spot may be very commonplace to the ordinary observer, and yet be of the unusual interest to the camper. It should be a good place for collecting and observing.

Do not burden yourself with unnecessary. You will be surprised to find how much you can do without, and how cheap your living may be. Secure a light tent, particularly if you are to move from place to place. It is usually handier to hang it from the ridgepole by loops of cord, for then it is easier to "pitch" than one which requires the ridgepole to be placed under the canvas, particularly in wet weather. A strong rope may be made to serve as a ridgepole.

Eating is a small part of camping out. Row or tramp by hours. The wild creatures eat when they can. If you intend to push on into the wilderness, your cooking utensils should be few and simple.

Fay due regard to the rights of others. Do not be lawless just because you are camping out. Property is always to be respected.—Christian Science Monitor.
