For Pieces of Silver

By A. MARIA CRAWFORD. "You will hardly recognize Jim Keenan, Anne. He used to be rather gone on you, didn't he, when he was 21 and as poor as a church meuse? Much water has flowed under the Much water has flowed under the bridge since then. He is better looking than ever, has social position—why, he is the lion of the really samrt set—and is making money by the kegful. I've heard that this play of his which he are going to see tonight has already netted him a comfortable fortune." explained Kate Kellar to her girlhoud chum who had arrived that day for a visit.

For a second Anne had been so surprised at the news that she could not think of a fitting reply. Then to hear that he has made such a success. His late books are so—so different from the things he used to write that I daresay I shall feel am meeting a comparative stranger when he comes to dinner tonight.

"Quite a dramatic strike, too I think, his giving us a theater party after dinner here. I've heard people say that you turned him down when he adored you. Now it must be comforting to his wounded pride to show you what name and fame he has acquired." Kate eyed her pretty visitor shrewdly but Anne's face was as calm as ever.

Later in a marvelously draped gray georgette that a celebrated modiste in Paris had designed especially for her, Anne turned away from a mirror with a little feeling of satisfaction. Jim Keenan might still find something to admire in the girl he had loved so ardently and so hopelessly—for Anne had been too proud to marry a poor, struggling genius who might never attain the distant heights a which his eager eyes were lifted.

Jim Keenan was all that Kate had said and more. At 35 his hair was pecially for her, Anne turned away said and more. At 35 his hair was said and more. At 35 his hair was prematurely and becomingly gray. His brown eyes under straight level eyebrows were as dream-filled as they had been when he was 21. Only his manner was wholly changed. In youth he had been moody, given to long silence. Now he was the life of the dinner party. He told the funniest stories. He met the light banter of the girls with a buoyancy that is usually only known to the youths usually only known to the youth-fully carefree.

Toward Anne, however, Jim Keenan was as impersonally cool as he had never seen her before in

When she had gone down to dinner. Anne carried a wrap along so when the others went rushing up-stairs to powder and rouge a bit before starting to the theater, merely slipped across the hall into a little den where she had left her cape. She leaned over to pick it up from a chair where the had careessly tossed it.

Illinois Central Urges Co-Operation

Of Its Patrons

The Illinois Central Railroad, like other railroads, faces the task of trying to move a greatly increased amount of business with facilities which are entirely inadequate. It is therefore of the utmost importance to make the existing equipment more efficient through increased mileage. This can only be done through the fullest co-operation between the railroads and the shippers.

The shipper is allowed forty-eight hours in which to load cars, and the consignee is allowed the same time to unload. By expediting the foading and unloading, they have it in their power to substantially increase the number of cars evailable for serving the public.

The average carload on all lines is only 70 per cent of the carrying capacity of the cars. Thus 30 per cent of the total car mileage is not being utilized. If all cars could be loaded to full tonnage capacity the car supply would be increased by nearly one-third. For ten years preceding Federal control, the railroads added to their equipment an average of 118.846 freight cars per year, while during the 26 months of Federal control the Government added a total of 100,000 freight cars, at the rate of only 46,152 per year. For ten years preceding Federal control, the railroads added to their equipment an average of 2,569 locomotives per year, while during the 26 months of Federal control the Government added a total of 2,000 locomotives, at the rate of only 923 per year. For ten years preceding Federal control, the railroads added to their equipment an average of 2,762 passenger cars per year, while during the 26 months of Federal control the Government added no passenger cars whatever. When the railroads went under Federal control on January 1. 1918, each railroad had upon its own line an average of 45 per cent of its own cars. while at the end of Federal control, March 1, 1920, each railroad had upon its own line an average of only 22 per cent of its own The result of this broadcast scattering of the cars was that the general condition of the cars deteriorated and was much worse at the end of Federal control than at the beginning.

These are some of the reasons why there is a shortage of transportation, reasons which everybody ought to know, but we are now more concerned about the present and anxious to accomplish the utmost that can be accomplished with the impaired railroad plant with which we shall have to work until the cars can be brought home and put in shape and additional facilities acquired.

I urge that our patrons do their utmost to help us keep the cars moving. When it is considered that freight cars spend one-third of their time in the hands of the shippers, it will be seen that the co-operation of the shippers is not only important, but absolutely necessary. The Illinois Central promises to meet its patrons more than-half way and will do everything within its power to serve them.

Constructive criticism and suggestions are invited.

C. H. MARKHAM, President, Illinois Central Railroad Company.
