Carl Wanderer Plans Surprise At Murder Trial.

Chicago Man May Reveal Identity of Stranger Killed At Time of Wife's Death.

Chicago Tribune—Omaha—Carl Wanderer, on trial for the murder of his wife, his unborn babe and an unidentified stranger, is preparing a surprise when he takes the stand in his own defense.

It has to do with the identity of the ragged stranger whom Wanderer engaged to stage the fake holdup and whom he shot to death after he was through with him.

The secret, it is believed, has to do with the identity of the stranger, but there is no inkling of what bearing it will have on the defense.

Wanderer, unshaven, haggard, red-eyed and open-mouthed, pays scant attention to the selection of the jury. He bases his hope of escape of the gallows on the alleged revelation he will make when he faces the jury.

In his examination of prospective jurors the state is laying unusual stress upon the insanity dodge. The jurors that have been tentatively chosen have given assurances that they would not be swayed by a plea of temporary insanity.

At 4 P.M. today the jury was expected to complete the jury by the end of the week. Two have been chosen out of the first venire of 100 men and two others may be accepted by both sides.

The Bee's Short Story.

By VIRGINIA LYNCH MAXWELL. The Jeremiah Weatherbees had again begun to turn their minds to the firework problem of where to spend their vacations.

Something nagged deep in Viola Weatherbee's heart. She could not make out what it was at first, but after a few days' poring through catalogues, railroad pamphlets and hotel announcements, an inspiring solution dawned.

"I have it," she announced to herself that morning. "I need a vacation after my own heart. Fifi, suddenly turning to her maid, her eyes sparkling with a new, eager light, 'How much do they pay a maid in a hotel?'"

"For—service—madam?" the girl asked in amazement.

"For whatever they have to do, Fifi, linen maid or chamber maid—low-muck, Fifi," as she set down a slipper from which she had read the various positions.

A half an hour later, when Viola had put Fifi through a literal third degree of questions concerning the life of a maid in a hotel, she herself had decided to try it herself.

"And," she continued, as she left the room to answer the jangling telephone, "not a word, Fifi—to anyone."

"Hello," Fifi heard her mistress' musical voice respond as she picked up the receiver, "oh, Alice, I'm so glad you called. Where? Oh, I know you'll enjoy the shore. But come over, tea, won't you? I have something very important to tell you—yes, at 4 P.M. today."

"At 4 P.M. today?" she asked, puzzled. "Yes, at 4 P.M. today," Alice smiled and listened patiently to her sister's tale of woe.

"Alice, I simply can't stand this stuff any longer. I'm going back to the simple things of life."

"But, Vi—a chambermaid—it can't be. Why, dear girl, you couldn't do that work—you couldn't," Alice tried to explain.

"I can't do that any longer. I'm going back," she said, "I'm going back. You know I did more strenuous work than that in the army canteen."

"But—what does Jerry say, Vi?" Alice tried a new angle of attack, suddenly remembering her sister's husband, "for goodness sake, Alice, don't breathe a word of it to him. Promise me that you won't, dear."

"All right, Vi—and good luck! Let me know where you are, so I can write you when you're gone. Vi spent a quiet evening after Alice had gone. Jerry had come home to dinner promptly, and unlike other times when she craved her husband's companionship tonight she wanted to be alone with her thoughts, for she had much planning to do.

Twice her meditations were interrupted by Jerry when he emerged from his study and went through a huge bunch of papers lying in the secretary drawer at her right. Not a word did he speak, however, and not until very late was she able to broach the subject of her vacation to him.

"Don't think I'll tell you where I'm going this summer, Jerry dear," she said playfully, "it would be more romantic not to—don't you think?"

"Then I can't tell you where I shall go," he smiled. The smile was the first real one in months and it gladdened Viola's heart.

A few mornings later found Viola awaiting from a public bus, carrying her own grip and being escorted into the linen-room, through the employees' entrance of the largest hotel on the mountain side.

"Mees Jones," the Swedish house-keeper announced to the other maids waving her hand toward Viola. "She will begin her work at once," and Vi, somewhat bewildered, but thrilled with anticipation, followed Dora, who had been detailed to show her around. Into the anteroom, stacked high with newly laundered linens of all kinds, Viola found her first task in folding hundreds of sheets, smoothing them carefully and sorting those to be mended.

"Two weeks of it and Vi was perfect at her work. The early rising had made her cheeks firm and smooth and a faint pink glowed through her clear, unpowdered skin. Her eyes too bespoke the sound sleep she now claimed as her nightly reward after a long day's work.

But Vi was human and she longed for the companionship of some one who would understand. She dared not write Jerry for he was certain to find out her mental capacity at the hotel. And Jerry would never understand Vi's enjoying this kind of thing. As she unpinned her white cap and apron and threw them across the little cot at one end of the maids' dormitory, Dora, whom Vi had come to know well now, beckoned to her.

"Want to go for a walk," Susie?" Dora asked, mischief beaming from her eyes.

"Who all the excitement?" the erstwhile Susie Jones had acquired some of the slang of her station. "Aint often we get a night off together," Dora went on, "and a night like this—just look at it—and she pointed to the soft round moon whose myriad beams filled the semi-darkened room in which the girls stood.

"Alone?" Viola asked after a moment.

"I'll say no," Dora flashed back, "I had a date with Jack, the chef—but he said he could fix it for you with his new pantry man—Philippe."

Vi turned and gazed somewhat frightened at the girl. But the assurance in Dora's eyes made her realize a little walk with a male companion could harm no one in the world. Least of all could it be offensive to Jerry—for he probably just then was waltzing around with some little debutante on the veranda of the Midfield Colony club. And besides—it would be interesting to know the viewpoint of the pantry man.

At eight o'clock the two girls were walking down the road where they were to meet Jack and Philippe. As they neared, they heard the two men talking in low tones.

"I don't want any girl," one of the men was saying. "Why, I'm married—to the sweetest little girl in the world—really," he assured him as the other laughed.

The two men laughed together and the girls came forward. Suddenly Viola drew back. Could it be possible—or was it just her subconscious mind? She went forward a few steps and this time her bewilderment rendered her speechless.

"Don't be bashful, honey—Dora said in introducing the silent Miss Jones to the wide-eyed Philippe as she gently tripped off with Jack.

"Vi—Vi—were the first words the man uttered when he had taken the erstwhile "Susie Jones" by the shoulders and looked straight into her clear blue eyes.

"Jerry dear—I don't understand why what are you doing here?" "Pantry—BOY!" he snapped quickly, his eyes sparkling with mischief, and accenting with pride the juvenile title the hotel had bestowed upon him.

"I never thought—that you wanted to come back—to nature—to—God, Jerry—to just live—Viola was saying absently.

"Nor you," he replied, solemnly, as visions of her latest bill for lingerie danced before his eyes.

"Let's do it—forever—Jerry—she looked up pleadingly and he caught the light of sincerity in her clear, round eyes.

"Forever and ever—" he assured her as they walked off together in new plans.

"You're more beautiful than ever Vi dear—" Jerry was saying as he brushed off a rock on which to seat his newly-found treasure.

"And I love you all over again—" she true aristocrat—Jerry dear—she returned. Then Jerry kissed her tenderly while Dora and Johnny grinned knowingly.

Soldier Insane From Bad Shrapnel Wound.

Shenandoah, Ia., Oct. 6.—(Special.)—A shrapnel wound in the head has caused Jake Vance, a former member of Company E, to lose his mind and he has been returned from the Philippines, where he was in service, to the state hospital at Clarinda.

When Mr. Vance was injured overseas a piece of silver plate was placed in his head, back of his ear. The wound continued to give him trouble and last summer he applied for government compensation. At that time he was thought not to be in a serious condition and was allowed a small compensation for a short time.

In January he re-enlisted and was sent to the Philippines. It was while serving there he was adjudged insane. The relatives of the soldier live at Trenton, Mo.

Men Who Rescued Sub Crew Receive Gifts.

Washington, Oct. 6.—As an expression of the American navy's gratitude for their efforts in rescuing the crew of the submarine S-5, the captains of the steamships Alanthus and General Goethals and several members of their crews were presented with gold watches and binoculars by Secretary Daniels.

Capt. E. A. Johnston of the Alanthus, the first ship to sight the submarine's protruding hull, represented the other recipients at the presentation. These were Capt. E. D. Swinson of the General Goethals, Chief Engineer W. G. Brief of the General Goethals, C. Jacobson of the Alanthus and R. Williams, assistant chief engineer of the Alanthus. The last three men worked the hand drills with which a hole was made large enough to prevent suffocation of the imprisoned men in the submarine's hold.

The meeting was called by the distribution of 5,000 circulars last night. The hall was packed. The crowd was orderly.

Many Soldiers Neglect To Call for Liberty Bonds.

New York, Oct. 6.—Speaking at a military reunion dinner, Brig. Gen. H. M. Lord, chief of finances of the United States army, said his department in Washington has 4,000 Liberty bonds, representing $375,000, which belong to soldiers who cannot be found. The bonds have been held for two years and carry coupons representing $30,000 in interest. The department, he said, had been unable to reach the owners at the addresses which they had given and had appealed to war organizations to help locate them.

Gen. Lord also said his department is holding 3,000 discharge certificates of soldiers who also cannot be found.

Butchers' Union To Fight 10-Hour Day Demand Here.

Meeting of 12,000 Workmen On South Side Starts Strike Rumors; Denied by Leaders.

Rumors of a strike of the 12,000 butcher workmen in the South Side packing plants, which were rife in South Omaha Tuesday night following the mass meeting of the Butcher Workmen's union in the organization's hall at Twenty-fifth and M streets, were denied by union officials Wednesday morning.

"The meeting was called so that we might inform the members of the union of the proposition that packers have made to Judge Julius Altschuler, arbitrator between packers and employes, whereby the 10-hour day would be restored, overtime pay done away with except when a man has worked 54 hours a week and seniority rights affected," declared District President J. H. Davis.

"We wished to explain to the men that the union will have attorneys to fight their rights and see that they get a square deal and thus quiet their fears.

"I don't believe that Judge Altschuler will allow these requests of the packers, but even if he should, there is little danger of a strike for at least a year. The men will live up to their agreement unless something radically unjust is done to them. We have no fears of a strike at the present time.

"There are a number of jokers in the proposition the packers have made to Judge Altschuler, but our representatives will see that they will not slip by unnoticed.

The meeting was called by the distribution of 5,000 circulars last night. The hall was packed. The crowd was orderly.

Blast Blows Car Into Bits, Driver Saved by Miracle

License Tag and Heavy Frame All Left of Car When Spark Sets Off Gasoline Tank.

Emmett Lindsay, 2518 M street, had a miraculous escape from death Tuesday night when his automobile was blown to pieces at Sixty-first and Q streets. Backfire from the engine caused the ignition of the gasoline tank, he said. Following the blast there was nothing left of the car except the license tag and the frame.

Lindsay was driving when engine trouble developed. He got out of his automobile at Sixty-first and Q streets to try to fix it. While he was tinkering at the front end of the car a sizzling noise started and he ran away from the car.

Lindsay had put but a short space between himself and the automobile when flames leaped into the air simultaneously with a violent explosion. The force of the blast was upward and for this reason Lindsay escaped uninjured.

Essentially this morning saw only a small scrap pile where the automobile made its last stand.

State Department Probing Shipment of Soviet Gold Into U. S.

Washington, Oct. 6.—The State department is conducting an investigation into the ownership and purpose of shipment of a little less than 1,000,000 rubles gold, something more than $300,000, into the United States from soviet Russian a week ago.

It is admittedly a problem whether anything can be done by the government even if the gold was sent here to be used to carry on propaganda, but the inquiry into its ownership and origin may determine whether it is "stolen goods" in the sense of having come imperiously into the hands of soviet Russian officials, if it is proved that it is bolshevik money.

It was stated that the investigation being made by the State department is for its own information and that so far it would be "rather strange" to say that there had been disclosed anything to give reason to believe that the gold is actually to be used for furthering propaganda.
