The Bee's Short Story
 By ELLA RANDALL PEARCE.
 On Monday young James Whitlock—Jimmy to everyone who knew him—began the week in his usual way, rising to the vibrant summons of the alarm clock, eating a hasty but cheerful breakfast in Mrs. Hettrick's well-patronized, if humble, dining room, and going blithely on his way to work as one of the insignificant clerks in the employ of Bonwit & Co., manufacturers of superior pants and varnishes.

On Tuesday Jimmy's whole world was changed as if by magic. Summons to a lawyer's office, a bewildering story of the demise of an old friend of Jimmy's father, who, having no near-of kin, had made generous provision for his child, and the debt to Jimmy's dead father by leaving the bulk of his fortune to Jimmy. Then came the reporters, scenting Jimmy's affluence almost before the youth himself realized it. And that evening, hiding his blushing face in the seclusion of his third-story hall room, Jimmy read the startling headlines referring to himself as one of the city's new millionaires.
 "It's nonsense! It can't be true. I'm dreaming," protested the young man to reflect on some of the possibilities of wealth. He did not sleep as soundly as usual that night. But the alarm clock rang as insistently as ever the next morning, and young Whitlock with a dazed feeling of having had a glittering dream dressed with his usual meticulous haste and descended to the dining room.

A strange hush was in the air. None of the old friendly greetings. Eyes regarded him in more or less open wonder or furtive envy. Polite voices offered congratulations. Mrs. Hettrick who sat at the head of the table leaned heavily toward Jimmy on her right.
 "It's so wonderful—I can't take it all in. But I suppose it's true, Mr. Whitlock?"
 "Guess it is," said Jimmy shyly. She beamed on him even as she sighed. "Then of course you'll be leaving us soon. We'll be missing you, too—but this is no place to stay a millionaire." And you taking it so calmly, Mr. Whitlock. Why, you don't look act a bit different."

"Give me time," muttered Jimmy with a sickly smile. "And you needn't worry, Mrs. Hettrick. I'm not going to leave you today."
 Instead of the hilarious "guying," Jimmy expected from his co-workers, he was met with respectful ceremony. One or two of the younger fellows made joking remarks in an undertone, and the girl at the switchboard giggled behind his back; but as a whole, the office force showed the crushing influence of the almighty dollar when it reaches the million mark.
 The taciturn Mr. Bonwit shook hands with him. "Great news, Jimmy! You certainly are a lucky chap! Now I suppose you'll be leaving us soon."
 Mrs. Hettrick's words exactly. Jimmy winced.
 "Why should I?" he returned. "I'm more interested in what I've been doing here than anything I can think of Mr. Bonwit. I'm going to study chemistry. How things are made is more interesting to me than who buys them. I'd like to follow that end of the business, Mr. Bonwit."

 "Well, I guess there'll be nothing to prevent you?" The taciturn Mr. Bonwit actually smiled and patted Jimmy's shoulder.
 At the end of an uncomfortable day, Mr. James Whitlock found himself avoiding a second meal at Mrs. Hettrick's and eating a lonely dinner in a restaurant where nobody knew him.
 Then came the evening and Edna. The one girl in the world for Jimmy. And in a burst of generosity the young man bought a bouquet of orchids and delivered them into the hands of his divinity.
 "Orchids—oh, Jimmy!" Edna looked at him in sad reproach. "You're getting extravagant already. I know in books and plays rich young men always buy orchids. But I think it's very silly. They're not half as nice as carnations, now are they, Jimmy?"
 "They don't smell as sweet," admitted the young man ruefully, "but I thought you'd like them Edna."
 "Oh, I do. But I think it was wasteful. And—" Edna looked away and sighed. "Of course it's going to make a difference with you Jimmy," she said mournfully. "And with us!"
 "With us?" The young man was startled. "Why should it make a difference with us?"
 Edna's lips drew in a rigid carmine line. She nodded her head decisively. "With you and with me, just see these flowers—orchids—they mark the difference already. You go right out and buy orchids. And I'm not an orchid girl."
 "Oh, gee!" muttered Jimmy. "Why does everybody think this money is going to make a different person of me? Some kind of a freak or a criminal, I should say. And now you, Edna—"

He came nearer with an eager light in his eyes. "The only difference it can make with us," he began, but Edna moved away and spoke quickly.
 "Wait and see how wise I am. I'm not in your class now. You'll meet the sort of girls who adore orchids and—"

Really, think it best you should not come to see me any more." Edna spoke regretfully but implacably, and her attitude was stony. "I have my own future to think about, James."
 "Say Mr. Whitlock and be done with it," retorted Jimmy miserably, as he reached for his hat.
 Young James Whitlock was summoned again to his lawyer's office the next day.
 "I regret to say—a second perusal of the papers in the case show a shrinkage of the—er—assets," informed the lawyer. "Your legacy will amount to considerable less than the first estimate. In fact, about a quarter of a million, I should say would be a fair—"

"Count it again, and I hope it shrinks," Jimmy glared aggressively across the lawyer's table.
 "And there is also a person claiming to see a legal heir who writes that he is going to contest the will—"

Transcontinental Canadian Flight Is Started at Halifax
 Halifax, N. S., Oct. 7.—Two officers of the Canadian Royal Air Force started the transcontinental flight to Vancouver this morning at 8 o'clock, when they "hopped off" from the Eastern Passage air station. They expect to reach Riviere du Loup on the first leg of their journey.
 Colonel Lockie and Major Basil Hobbs, both members of the Distinguished Service Order, were the officers who began the flight across the dominion which is expected to blaze the way for regular air travel. They used a light seaplane. Weather conditions were favorable.
 If conditions in the western provinces make the use of a seaplane inexpedient, they plan to switch to a land plane.
Franklin Roosevelt Asks Voters to Support League
 Pueblo, Colo., Oct. 7.—Support for the national democratic ticket because it favors going into the league of nations and affords the best opportunity for the development of the wonderful resources of the west, was asked by Franklin D. Roosevelt, democratic vice presidential nominee, in an address here before an audience which filled the municipal auditorium.
 on the way he stopped in at the florist's shop and bought a dozen carnations.
 "By gee, they are sweet! Just like—well, perhaps she'll listen to me now," he mused happily. "I'll stay at Mrs. Hettrick's till we get married. And I'll take up a new line with Benwit. And when the money comes—" A broad smile overspread Jimmy's features—"I'll give it to Edna for a wedding present and let her do the worrying!"

Two Nebraska Cases on Supreme Court Docket
 Washington, D. C., Oct. 7.—(Special Telegram)—The United States supreme court has put two cases on the docket from Nebraska to be argued during the present term. The titles of the cases are: Henry Ralph and Mary Thomas, plaintiffs in error, against Harry W. Howarth, administrator, et al, and the Postal Telegraph Co. against the city of Fremont. Both cases were appealed from the Nebraska supreme court.

Columbus Canning Plant Doubles Season's Pack
