More Truth Than Poetry

Perhaps I am cold, for I never can sob, Or otherwise voice my emotion, When a tenor devotes all his loveliest notes To reciting his filial devotion. And as for the lady who tearfully wails

That, in spite of the sorrows that grieve her,
How happy she'd be 'neath the old apple tree—
I simply refuse to believe her.

I can't help suspect that the lads who proclaim That their hearts have been utterly broken Since they wandered no more on the Wabash's shore Have never been west of Hoboken. When people declare they are stirred by the strains Of "Way Down in Dixie" I doubt 'em.

That there's something that's phony about 'em. The lovely young lady who croons in a voice
That is full of emotional quiver,
How her heart would be glad if her darling old Dad
Would only come back and forgive her, Is probably drawing four hundred a week With her name on the vaudeville headline

And I think when their cheers hurt the drums of my ears,

While her Dad, poor old slob, hasn't got any job
And is taking his meals on the breadline. Maternal affection I would not desire Nor sneer at—yet somehow or other, I shed not a tear when a singer I hear Bewailing the loss of his mother. The fellow who warbles these heart-breaking songs So often in my house or your house, Would not give a cent if his old mother went

Is Canada So Named? (Copyright, 1920, by the Wheeler Syndicate, Inc.) Sir John Barrow, in his treatise on the history and discovery of the Dominion of Canada, states that when the Portuguese, under

Gaspar Catteseal in 1590 first ascended the St. Lawrence, they believed it was the strait for which they were searching-the northwest passage to the Indies. But, arriving at a point where they could clearly ascertain that it was not a strait but a river, they exclaimed, with all the emphasis of disappointed hopes, "Canada, Canada!" meaning, literally, "Here is nothing!"

He wore a belt around his waist, and inThere was old Mr. Turtle, for inside it he stuck a club, which was stance. Paddy was forever waving his club at him and telling him to "move on!" And when Mr. Frog and his friends tried to have a singing party of an evening, Paddy Muskrat was sure to come and order them to "make less noise!" It seemed as if a person couldn't do anything to please Paddy Musk-rat. And everybody began to be sorry that he had been chosen to guard the pond.

As a guard Paddy proved to be of little use. When Tommy Fox came nosing along the edge of the pond, or one of the Great Horned Owl family hovered about the neighborhood, Paddy didn't give a warning slap on the water as he should have done. He claimed that no policeman ever gave a warning in that way. And he said his neighbors ought to give him a policeman's

"Stop stealing our fish or I'll arrest you!" It was only natural that Fatty Coon should be angry when he was spoken to like that. He pretended to be frightened, however. And Paddy Muskrat at once grew so bold that he stepped quite close to Fatty and ordered him to "be off!"

Fatty Coon leaped at Paddy. He caught hold of Paddy's belt; and the Paddy Muskrat was terribly frightened.

"Let me go!" he shouted. "Or I shall call for help. Do you want the other policemen to come? How would you like to fight 50 police-Fatty Coon only laughted at him. "You're the only policeman in this pond," he said.

"Is that so?" Paddy Muskrat "Do you see those clubs over there?" He pointed over Fatty's shoulder. Fatty Coon couldn't help looking around. And there, not far behind him, he beheld—sticking up in the air—as many as a hundred policemen's clubs, exactly like the one Paddy Muskrat had in his hand. As Fatty gazed at the clubs they seemed to wave at him. All at once Fatty Coon was frightened. He let go of Paddy Muskrat's belt and made for a tree, as fast as he could run.

Then Paddy threw away his own club and went home. He told his wife to cut the brass buttons off his blue suit, because he said he would
