

CHAPTER I

A Queer Place to Live The village near one end of Pleas-ant Valley where Farmer Green often went to sell butter and eggs was not the only village to be seen from Blue Mountain. There was another which Farmer Green seldom visited, because it lay beyond the mountain and was a long distance from his house. Though he owned the land where it stood, those that lived there thought they had every right to stay there as long as they pleased with.

there as long as they pleased, with-out being disturbed.

It was in this village that Brown:e B-aver and his neighbors lived. It was a different sort of town, too, from the one where Farmer Green went each week. Over beyond Blue Mountain all the houses were built in a pond. And all their doors were under water. But nobody minded that because—like Brownie Beaver everybody that dwelt there was a

Years and years before Brownie's time his forefathers had come there, and finding that there were many trees in the neighborhood with the sort of bark they liked to eat—such as populars willows and how alders. as poplars, willows and box elders—they had decided that it was a good place to live. There was a small stream, too, which was really the beginning of Swift River. And by damming it those old settlers made a pond in which they could build their beauty of the stream of

They had ideas of their own as to what a house should be like—and yery good ideas they were—though you, perhaps, might not care for them at all. They wanted their houses to be surrounded by water, because they thought they were safer when built in the manner. And they slaves insist I that a door leading into a house should be far leading into a house should be far beneath the surface of the water, for they believed that that made a ouse safer too.

To you such an idea may seem very strange. But if you were chased by an enemy you might be glad to be able to swim under water, down to the bottom of a bond, and slip in-side a door which led to a winding hall, which in its turn 1 d upwards into your house.

Of course, your enemy might be able to swim as well as you. But maybe he would think twice—or even three times-before he went prowling through your crooked hall. For if vou had enormous, strong, sharp teeth—with which you could gnaw right through a tree—he would not care to have you seize him as he poked his head around a corner in a dark passage of a strange house. It was in a house of that kind that Brownie Beaver lived. And he built it himself, because he said l. . would rather have a neat, new house than one of the big, old dwellings that had been built many years before, when his great-great-grandfather had helped throw the dam across the The dam was there still. It was

The dam was there still. It was so old that trees were growing on it. And there was an odd thing about it; it was never finished. Though Brownie Beaver was a young chan, he worked on the dam sometimes, like all his neighbors. You see, the villagers kept making the dam wider. And since it was built of sticks and mud, the water sometimes washed bits of it away; so it had to be kept in repair. f Brownie Beaver and his friends had neglected their dam, they would have waked up some day and found that their pond has empty; and without any water to hide their

Strictly speaking, a lightning-rod does not really absorb the thunder, because the material from which the rod is made cannot act as a deadener for sound of this nature. But the fact re-mains that no thunder is heard when lightning is carried off by the rod itself. This is because no lightning "discharge," in the usually accepted sense of the word, occurs.

The purpose of the rod is to prevent the accumulation of a destructive charge capable of breaking through the air between the thunder-cloud and the house or other object on the surface of the earth which is equipped with the protective apparatus. The pointed end of the rod, thrust upward towards the cloud, withdraws the electricity in a practically continuous current, and its function is analogous to that of the safety valve on a boiler. The latter prevents steam from rising to a pressure where it would burst the walls of the boiler and the former keeps the electricity from gathering in a quantity sufficient to cause a sudden and disastrous discharge. Without this discharge there is no production of thunder, and the rod therefore prevents the cause of the thunder, rather than deadening or absorbing it after it has

TOO LATE NOW

When Doctor Osler said that men Of forty years or more Could never do the work again They'd done in days of yore, And that when middle-age decay

Began to sap their powers, Twere best to ease them on their way To better worlds than ours, We sadly bounced an anvil off Our aged grandad's chest, And, with a faint reproachful cough, He entered into rest.

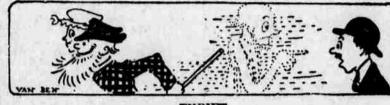

And though it often made us weep To see his vacant chair Where afternoons he used to sleep The sunlight on his hair. Though home seemed quite a different place Without the gentle cheer

Reflected in his kindly face, For many a happy year, That duty had been firmly met 'Twas comforting to know, And so we stifled our regret And said, "'Tis better so."

But now we learn that forty years Finds people in their prime And that thereafter their careers May well become sublime, And that with goat-gland's artful aid A man of seventy-two Can very easily be made As young and strong as new, With an uneasy, haunting doubt Our hearts begin to quake;

We fear that easing grandad out,

and pass through a table.

The trick should be performed while you are seated at a table.

The coin is wrapped in a sheet of note paper, five or six inches square. There's a particular method of wrapping the coin. The paper is folded, as shown in Figure 1, the lower edge of the sheet coming to within an inch of the upper edge. The side of the upper edge. The side shown in the illustration is toward you. The sides A and B are folded back and the side C is folded down.

The coin, apparently wrapped securely, is really in an outer fold. Turn the package over, permitting it to fall to the mouth of the fold or pocket. Grip it through the paper, however, to through the paper, however, so that it does not show. Tap the package on the table to show that the coin is still there. Reach for a napkin with the hand not holding the package, and as you
