HOLDING A HUSBAND Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

The Way Dicky Amazed and Then Delighted Madge. Dicky's sudden gust of anger at what he termed the "cursed self-sufficiency" of Lillian and myself vanished as suddenly as it had appeared.

"Let me tell you something, my dear. You, of course, have certain inalienable rights as a woman, and all the rest of it—you probably can't spell the proper jargon a great deal better than I can—but there are two things, I think, you sometimes are perilously near forgetting in your desire to see that everybody's happiness is straightened out according to Hoyle."

"He paused, while I struggled with nervous humiliated tears, for there was something stronger than ridicule in his last words. I wondered if he really considered me the 'meddlesome Matty' which the caustic words seemed to imply."

"One of these things, the lesser in importance," he resumed, slowly, "is the fact that you happen to be my wife, and that I have—or am supposed to have—a certain responsibility for your safety. The other is that you are Junior's mother, and that you have no moral, legal or any other kind of right"—his voice suddenly grew sterner and deeper than I had ever known Dicky's voice to be—"to jeopardize yourself in any way because of him."

I straightened myself in my seat, preparing to defend myself against this astonishing indictment.

Dicky Commands. "But, Dicky!" I stammered, and I never in our lives together had felt quite so subdued, so chastened, so young as I did in this unexpected moment so amazing to me, "I don't see how I risked anything in this affair of Rita Brown."

"You don't, eh?" Dicky fairly snapped the words at me. "Well, I do, and in few moments I'll elucidate a few points to your enlightening intelligence! But in the meantime, suppose you tell me a few minute details. Fess up, now—just how did this mess get stirred up?"

I set my lips obstinately. What I had done about Rita Brown was my own affair. I could tell Dicky that. But without revealing the fact that Leila had believed the things Rita had said, I could not give my reasons for interfering. That was a secret which I had pledged my little friend to keep from her fiancé.

"I could not betray it to her husband. I was prepared for anything from Dicky save a peal of laughter. As I looked at him in angry amazement he leaned over and patted my cheek in much the way that he would have tried to pacify an angry child."

"Don't be angry, old dear," he coaxed, "but it is too funny to see you protecting the secrets of your friends with your heart's blood. Of course, there's no use putting Alf on—he's too much in love just now to be quite sane—but don't try to pull any wool over my eyes. Let me rehearse the scene for you."

He stopped and struck a theatrical attitude.

"Lovely Persecuted Heroine comes to Faithful Woman Friend," he began. "Says she to her, 'Rita Brown's been telling some perfectly awful things about me steady, and everything's all off!' says she to her, 'Too-hoo! I think I'm going to die!'"

"Fear not!" says Faithful Woman Friend. "I'll fix things. I'm the original female detective, gets word to her soulmate—also a general fixer in little old New York—and Souley sends on pronto some dope, that, properly administered to the fair Rita, sends her skidding forever out of Lovely Persecuted Heroine's way. Close-up of lovers reconciled."

"Dicky dropped his theatrical manner as he would shed a troublesome coat, and leaned over toward me, saying: 'That's about the right dope, maybe with a few modifications. But what I want to know is, what did Rita say to you when you gave her your little ultimatum?'"

I was too astonished at his intuition or his deductive powers—I did not know which to credit—to answer him for a moment. He repeated his question impatiently.

I told him reluctantly, using—at most as if hypnotized—the very words of the threat Rita had sent me. His face darkened as he listened.

"It's no good business," he said. "Rita Brown is no slouch when it comes to possibilities of getting even. If you don't look out you'll have enemies strewn all around this world and the next, upper and lower. It's all very well to be a feminine Don Quixote, sacking all around the place, but kindly remember that Alf is nut, and what she tried to do to you. Remember, also the gifted Miss Draper, although I don't believe poor Grace is dangerous any longer, and for goodness sake cut, which she makes herself, and although it is not stylishly cut and silk-lined, it keeps her warm during the long winter months."

Being Late for School

By LORETTO C. LYNCH. Housekeeping, or the lack of it, affects so many phases of everyday life that folks are beginning to take it more seriously than ever.

It is encouraging to see the respect for housekeeping these progressive men and women of the west have for housekeeping.

There has come to my attention through a member of the Mothers' club in a small town in California just how a little help in the matter of housekeeping succeeded in changing "the world" for four school children.

To begin with, the children were either absent or late most every day. The school authorities did all in their power to correct this matter, but without success.

Then one of the teachers suggested that some of the mothers present at the meeting that day make a friendly visit to the home.

"Speak no English," muttered the mother, as she opened the door. But the ladies had anticipated just such a situation when they included a member who spoke Spanish.

The children were not on time for school because their mother knew practically nothing about housekeeping a la Americaine. This was the story in a nutshell.

But these women of the Mothers' club did not stand aloof or pass judgment on this foreigner. Instead, they set about to help her. She needed no financial assistance, for the men of her family were earning more than the men in most of the families these women of the Mothers' club represented.

They invited her to one of the meetings. She came, and she stayed, and now her children get to school on time.

Children are frequently absent or get to school late because "mother couldn't find my stockings." Again, "mother could not get the breakfast ready because the bread had not come," or, "mother had coming and forgot to wash out some clothes for me."

These and many of the other excuses children give, merely indicate a lack of housekeeping system. Then what? Just this: Every woman must devise some sort of a system and stick to it so that the youngsters get a "square deal." If the children are to have toast bread and milk for breakfast, the bread might be purchased the evening before, sliced, trimmed and placed on a plate all ready to slip into the toaster over the next morning. Or, there should be some bread substitute on hand. Crackers or zwieback may be considered substitutes.

For the mornings the milk is delayed, the thoughtful woman has on hand some dried whole milk which may be made into cocoa in a very few moments.

One of the frequent causes for the delay of children getting ready for school in the morning is the difficulty in finding their clothing. This comes often from the children being permitted to stay up so late at night that they are too tired to properly hang their clothing in a definite place for the night. It likewise comes from the child's clothing lacking distinguishing marks. It will pay the housewife to sew initials or the child's name on each stocking, each piece of underwear and every other garment that might give rise to slightest dispute and cause delay.
