HIGH HAIRDRESSING COMING BACK

reigning style, should remain unchanged. For, after all, nothing is smart and stylish unless it is adapted to the individual. Illustrative of that, many of the best dressed women forego year after year style innovations and cling righteously to the lines that are theirs. A coiffure is to be treated the same. If a new style promises an improvement, try it. If not, stick to the style you have found the best frame for your face.

Direction for High Coiffure.
To arrive at the high Parisienne hairdress referred to above, the hair is divided into four parts—front, back and sides. The back hairs drawn up tightly to serve as a padding for the high front mound. If this back hair is short, false padding will have to be used.
The sides are then adjusted with the ends tucked under the front part for more padding. And then the front part is drawn over all with the ends tucked in at the back of this front mound.
My friend tells me that combs are taboo on this dressing, although it would seem an ideal time to produce the tortoise shell you've been saving for such a day. The idea is to have the height forward on the crown of the head.
This may mean a new hat with a high, soft crown, but what's a little thing like that when we're always looking for a good excuse for a new chapeau?
