Ice in Sickroom.

What's Yours?

Women's Ideas That Paid Big Dividends

By FRANCES L. GARSIDE.
Ida M. Mellen "Fished" for an Idea—and Landed a Big One.

Ida M. Mellen had always been interested in all forms of water life.

It occurred to her one day that this natural aptitude ought to mean more to her than going fishing; there must be a knowledge of water life that could be sold for greater returns than were ever paid for a day's sport with hook and line.

She took course after course in school and college, always with this objective in view; she would know more about everything that had its being in the water, and she would take that knowledge to market some day.

That this was a new profession for women did not affect her decisions. She would make her life work along the lines of things she loved most, no matter if a drop it.

Woman had never trod the path before her. She talked fish, she studied fish, she wrote fish. There was nothing too small nor too great in the water to attract her. She became a stenographer in an aquarium that she might have greater opportunity to study; she was promoted to clerk; she arranged the books and files and put all information about aquarium life in logical order.

This was not so long ago, but now she is the only woman on a board of 60 men at the head of the largest zoological association in the world.

It would have been easier in the beginning to have set aside such an ambition, knowing the hard work it would take to attain it.

But that was not her idea. You have an idea of what you would like to do as your contribution to the world. Don't let it drop it.
