Does a Stream Run Most ly in the Center?

Sitting on the bank of a narrow stream, it is easy to note that the middle of the water is moving distinctly more rapidly than the portion closer to the banks. That this is not an optical delusion may be proved by the fact that a small stick or other light ob-ject thrown into the middle will travel downstream considerably faster than one tossed in close to the edge. This difference in speed is due to the friction of the water at the sides of the stream, which is con-stantly being held back by rub-bing against the banks; just as the bottom or base of a wave is retarded when it reaches the shallow water near the shore Therefore, when compared with the water near the sides, that in the center moves more swiftly, in spite of being slightly held back by the friction between it and the slower water on the out-side. But the friction between water and water is much less than that between water and a solid, so this does not materially alter the speed of the current in the center.
