

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

The Way Maj. Grantland Whisked Dicky and Madge Home

The night drive back to Cedar Crest was rather a silent one. Maj. Grantland's chauffeur was standing by the car when we came out, but when we had been seated and my bags disposed of in the tonneau, the officer himself took the driver's seat, and bade his man sit beside him. "That means we're going to go like the devil," Dicky murmured in my ear. "I've heard that when he wants speed and safety he drives himself, won't trust anybody else."

I made no reply, for fear that Maj. Grantland might hear me, and know that we were discussing him. And that was the last opportunity I had of any conversation which wouldn't have been breathless.

For drive like the devil, or the wind, or any of the other similes motorists love, Hugh Grantland did. The road was a good one, practically deserted, with few crossroads. The car's powerful headlights gleamed far ahead of us, illuminating every crevice of the road, and I realized why I had heard so many motorists say that they would rather drive in the night than in the daytime.

But even at the great speed we were making I was not nervous. The big car and the big man seemed to be interchangeable parts of the same body. One felt like the mechanism were something living, comprehending and responding to every lightest touch of its master.

On and on we went, past peach orchards, freshly planted cotton fields, through stretches of woodland, into the lighted streets of a village and out again, until at last we flashed through Cedar Crest, slowed down at Mrs. Lukens' driveway, and stopped before the door of our own cottage.

Mother Graham's Questions.

"Now, if you'll show us where your trunks are," Maj. Grantland said briskly, "we'll get them out on the veranda. If they're steamers we can pile them in here, but anything larger I can get a man for at the station. And I'll see that they're checked through for you while you're packing up."

"Thanks, awfully, old man. They're all strapped up and in the hall, both Madge's and mine. But I hate to have you—"

"Suppose you let me worry about that," Maj. Grantland retorted quietly, "and you devote your attention to getting ready as rapidly as possible. Unfortunately we have to plan as if the train were going to be on time, although the chances are in favor of its being very late. No," as we entered the hall, and Dicky attempted to help with the trunks. "Go on. We'll take care of these. Ah, Mrs. Graham! You see I've brought back your family, but only for a few minutes."

He bowed ceremoniously to Mother Graham, who had come into the hall, the picture of blank astonishment. Her eyes caught mine questioningly. I tried to reassure her with a glance. Dicky caught the glance and evidently comprehended it, for his eyes twinkled as he swept us both into the little sitting room and closed the door. He evidently shared my intuition that Major Grantland would rather have us out of the way.

Got a Saxophone at Home?

The School Board Wants It

An appeal was issued to the public yesterday by Assistant Superintendent of the Schools Belle Ryan for musical instruments, from mouth organs to saxophones of the latest jazz type, to be used in the organization of orchestras in all of the elementary schools of the city.

This is in line with the program outlined before the Board of Education by Supt. L. H. Beveridge at the last meeting. An instructor for these juvenile orchestras has already been secured.

Anyone in Omaha who has a musical instrument in good shape, but considered discarded about the home, is urged by Miss Ryan to turn it over to the principal of the nearest school in his neighborhood.

"Now I see how it was Madge got away so easily this morning," Dicky announced mischievously. "Mother, you old schemer, I'm ashamed of you."

"What does this mean?" his mother demanded, addressing me and ignoring her son. But he forestalled my answer.

"It means that I found the recalcitrant lady, but just as I was about to string her up by her thumbs the strike was declared off and we're both going north on this next train," he said. "Now I'm going to pick up my traps and Madge is going to change her dress. You'd better help her, mother."

But as I knew it would be, it was not I whom Mother Graham helped. I exchanged a humorous glance of comprehension at this offer, for we both knew what the next few minutes would be.

I never worked faster in my life than I did in exchanging the gown in which I had dined with Major Grantland for my traveling suit. Before I had finished Dicky was calling frantic appeals for the whereabouts of his things to both his mother and me. And as soon as I had put all my own things where they could be put into the car at a second's notice I went to the sun parlor in which Dicky was rampaging around.

Then I flew down the hall to the room where Junior lay asleep, hung over his crib in the same agony of apprehension which I had felt in the afternoon and turned to find my father standing behind me.

"I know, daughter," he said, seeing my wet eyes. Then he drew me into his arms.

"I confess I wish I were going with you," he said a bit anxiously, and I suddenly realized that even as I was worrying over leaving my baby he was filled with anxiety over my trip north without him.
