The new days, the new days, of them I want to sing, The new days with the fancies and the golden dreams they bring; The old days had their pleasures, but likewise have the new. The gardens with their roses and the meadows bright with dew; We love today the self-same way they loved in days of old; The world is bathed in beauty and it isn't growing cold; There's joy for us a-plenty, there are tasks for us to do, And life is worth the living, for the friends we know are true. -Edgar Guest.

This is but a line or so from one of Edgar Guest's poems which are so popular with the public. Edgar Guest is a man who knows human nature and has cleverly portrayed it in his poems-which come in several volumes and can be secured in various bindings. Those who heard him during his recent visit to Omaha will surely wish to own a set of his works and those who were not fortunate enough to hear him will enjoy reading his books equally as well. We have a splendid assortment of Edgar Guest's books, among them:
