What's What

It may be thought that every one ought to know that it is a gross impropriety to apply the handkerchief to the nose during a meal, but many other less well-behaved men and boys seem to think nothing of "blowing the trumpet" between mouthfuls, no matter how offensive the action may be to other and more sensitive diners.

No one suffering with a cold or with a chronic catarrh should attend any dinner party. If the cold had been caught after accepting the invitation the only recourse is to write at once or telephone to the hostess, so that an unaffiliated guest may be invited instead of the handkerchief-user. Even in the privacy of home life the contagion of a literally "bad" cold is prevented by isolating the victim at meal times.
