What's What

By HELEN DECIE

It is very rude to talk during any musical performance. At concerts and at the opera, those who come to hear and to enjoy the music have cause to be irritated by the foolish whispering and tittering of people who know and care so little about the divine art that it is a cause for wonder why they ever attend a performance—unless to see and to come with "ears attuned to sweet sounds."

Emily Keller Takes New Office

Emily Keller

Miss Emily Keller was appointed recording secretary for the Omaha Drama League by the board of managers at their business session Monday afternoon at the Omaha club. She will take the place of Miss Erna Reed, who leaves Wednesday for a stay of two months in New York City. Miss Keller will add the duties of recording secretary to those of corresponding secretary, which office she also holds.

During the business session, following a luncheon, Mrs. E. M. Syfert, president, asked for reports from Mrs. W. A. C. Johnson, chairman of membership; Mrs. Samuel Burns, chairman of bulletins; Mrs. Henry S. McDonald, treasurer; Mrs. Victor Rosewater, chairman of education, and Mrs. Edgar M. Morsman, jr., chairman of Pilgrim tercentenary poem contest. Mrs. Morsman's report of the contest was followed by a reading of the prize poem written by Elizabeth Patton, 17-year-old high school girl. Mrs. Ida M. Hanchett, who read the poem, said she considered it a remarkable piece of work.

Mary Irene Wallace gave a pleasing, illuminating discussion of the dramatic work at the High school. Col. T. W. McCullough spoke delightfully on "Why There Are so Few Good Plays on the Stage."

"It is a commercial proposition," he said summarizing. It is his opinion that people are tiring of the movies, that the movie does not entirely satisfy, that we are still suffering from the effects of war, and that good-drama will come again into its own in the future.

Rabbi Frederick Cohn spoke on the relation of drama and religion.

Problems That Perplex

Answered by BEATRICE FAIRFAX

The Road to Misery. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am deeply in love with a young man who is married. He is also in love with me. Should I see him again or not? It seems I just cannot live without him. If I wanted him to he would get a divorce, but I know his wife loves him and my love for him is too great to cause any unhappiness for those who love him. Won't you please advise me what to do.

Do you believe that the man who pretends to love you while he is bound in honor to another woman will treat you one jot differently from the way he's treating her? Do you think the man who is dishonest to his marriage vows now can be counted on to treat them reverently at another time? Do you think he'll trust you? Won't he always remember that you were once a thief of love, and so watch you with ugly, suspicious eyes? Apart from the fact that you're robbing and cheating his wife, don't you see that you're robbing yourself of all chance of happiness? Stop seeing him. You can do that, and time will bring forgetfulness. It always does.

Mountains From Trifles. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am acquainted with a young lady whose mother is most particular. Having been introduced to the young lady's mother I invited the young lady to go out with me.

Recently I learned that she went motoring with a man I do not know. She tells me that this chap has invited her to the theater. She accepted without hesitating. I am very fond of this young lady, and judging from little things she has done and things she has said, I flatter myself enough to believe she cares for me a little. Has she treated me fairly?

Don't look around so earnestly for trouble. You're likely to find it. Just go ahead and enjoy the girl's friendship. Win as high a place as you can in her regard. Don't study the other fellow and how he's treated. All this supersensitiveness can only make for discomfort all round. What counts is how does your own friendship fare?

Perhaps He's Sensitive. Dear Miss Fairfax: What should a girl do when she has been going out with a man for a year, and he does not want her to go about with any other men or friends? He speaks of marriage only in joke. Do you think this man can be very sincere? R. G.

It sounds as if the man were a bit sensitive about his inability to support a wife, and were protecting himself by his feelings by this manner of airy nonsense and laughing off the situation. If the girl cares for him at all, she should be able to judge if he's trying to save himself by committing himself while trying to hold the girl as long as he can't—or if the first suggestion comes the case.

Crocheting. Dear Miss Fairfax: Do you know of anyone that does crocheting with thread of about 60, 70 or 80. If you do will you please send me her address. Miss Emma Sagert, Wahoo, Neb., 701 North Broadway. I cannot answer your question with the name of any one, so am publishing your letter in the hope that some one will write to you.

Grumann Speaks On Play-Jane Clegg

"It is vastly more difficult to properly interpret perfect work than faulty work," spoke Professor Paul H. Grumann of the University of Nebraska, Lincoln, before members of the Omaha Drama League Tuesday afternoon at the Fontenelle. His subject was Jane Clegg by Sir John Ervine.

"The author has observed life through a lifetime, he grasps essentials and analyzes situations. The plot is simple and has little distraction from the main theme. Characterization in drama is accomplished by means of dialogue and this Ervine has done with a skill which shows a spirit of art."

Professor Grumann's next lecture will be given Tuesday, February 1. Previous to this lecture, Gregory Zilboorg of the Moscow Art theater will give a lecture for the Drama League on Friday afternoon, January 28.

Through the courtesy of Mrs. E. M. Syfert, president of the Omaha Drama League, Oscar Wilder Craik of the Craik-Roberts studio announced plays to be given at a series of Saturday afternoon teas at the studio. Drama League members were invited to attend.

HOLDING A HUSBAND Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

What Greeted Madge in Marvin. "Get your hat and your coat on, Marion," Lillian directed as we finished our luncheon, and when the child had disappeared she drew me into the hall and said in a tone which was almost a whisper: "I must explain Marion's little speech, Madge," she said. "You know it isn't necessary," I said earnestly. "But I must," she said vehemently. "I couldn't have you think that I had made any plans concerning Robert without telling you. You have been with me through it all, and you certainly have a right to know anything that develops."

Her eyes were burning as they held mine, while her face was white. "I saw that she was in the grip of some powerful feeling. "I only hope that what Marion's little speech implied is true," I said gravely, slipping my arm around her. "But it isn't," she said almost fiercely. "It can't be. You know that. I have gone over it so many times with you. But Marion loves him so dearly—you know she has teased from the time she met him to 'have Uncle Robert for a father,' that when she was ill with influenza I told her that some time when she was a big girl Uncle Robert might come to us. Of course, I bound her to secrecy, but she evidently—and rightly—considers you as one of us, hence her startling announcement at the luncheon table. I was wrong, absolutely, in chiding her, but she startled me terribly by her calm reference to 'Uncle Robert coming to stay.'"

A Torturing Situation. I slipped my hands down to her wrists, holding them firmly while I looked at her steadily. "You are a wonderful woman, Lillian," I said slowly, "and no one yields you more deference and affection than I. But I cannot help reiterating what I have told you before, that you are spoiling two lives, yours and Robert's, and depriving Marion of a great happiness by your adherence to that Quixotic resolution of yours."

Her wrists twisted under my hands and her eyes were tortured as they met mine. "You forget, I promised Robert that when Marion came to years of understanding she should decide. I cannot permit her to choose now when she has no realization of what the reopening of that old scandal would mean to her. No, dear, I must drive my wedge."

I let her go, for I saw by the expression of her face that it was useless for me to say anything further then. Besides, we heard Marion's feet dancing down the stairs. But I did not mean to give up so easily. I was sure that happiness for my friend lay only in marrying Robert Savarin, the gifted artist, whom she has loved ever since the days when he gave her first chance at her career.

Terror Undefined. Dimly a new argument came to me, which I locked away in a chamber of my brain for future use. It was one which, properly managed, I thought might influence even the stubbornness of Lillian Underwood. "The past will be here in five minutes, Madge," Lillian called back from the stairs to which she had gone when I released her. Her voice was as placid as if she had not just passed through an incident that had shaken her. "I'll be ready," I returned as calmly, while I followed her upstairs to get my own wraps, not forgetting the heavy coat I use for motoring. When I met Lillian again at the foot of the stairs I saw that she had similarly equipped herself and Marion. Indeed, we made our way to the station, looking as if we were starting out on an Arctic expedition. "Here's your car, Auntie Madge," Marion called as we alighted at the Marvin station, and a driver from the garage in which I had stored my car came up to us smiling broadly. "She's in fine shape, Mrs. Graham," he said. "I went over her this morning myself and everything's working fine."

"Thank you so much," I returned, slipping him the tip he evidently expected. In another minute, with Lillian and Marion beside me, I was on my way home—with a little pang I remembered that it was home no longer.

I turned in at the Durkee driveway first, as we wished to leave Marion in Mrs. Durkee's care before opening the cold and unaired house. But there was no response to my knock at the door. With the conviction that my little neighbor and Edith Fairfax were not at home I started the car along the winding driveway that connects the two places, coming out into our own driveway just in time to see little Mrs. Durkee, with wild eyes and horror-stricken face come flying out of our side door, with Edith Fairfax following more sedately in her wake. SURE WAY TO GET RID OF BLACKHEADS There is one simple, safe and sure way that never fails to get rid of blackheads and that is to dissolve them. To do this get two ounces of calomine powder from any drug store sprinkle a little on a hot, wet sponge—rub over the blackheads briskly—wash the parts and you will be surprised how the blackheads have disappeared. Big blackheads, little blackheads, no matter where they are, simply dissolve and disappear, leaving the parts without any mark whatever. Blackheads are simply a mixture of dust and dirt and secretions from the body that form in the pores of the skin—pinching and squeezing only cause irritation, make large pores, and do not get them out after they become hard. The calomine powder and the water simply dissolve the blackheads so they wash right out leaving the pores free and clean and in their natural condition. Anybody troubled with these unsightly blemishes should certainly try this simple method.
