Holding a Husband

Adèle Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

The Question Made/Asked Herself About Lillian. Dicky was distinctly resentful at my telephone message that Lillian, Marion and I meant to stay in Marvin all night, leaving him sole dominion over Lillian's apartment and old Betty.

"Why the sudden change of plan?" he asked crossly. "I thought you were going to be home by dinner time. Nice way to treat a fellow, waiting till this hour to spring the fact you're not coming home."

"But Betty'll have your dinner ready just the same," I urged. "Lillian gave her instructions as to dinner before she left, and she's going to telephone her now, so that she'll know only you will be there."

"But I wasn't coming home to dinner anyway," Dicky explained impatiently. "Holmes insists that I dine with him at his club tonight. He has a lot of new stuff he wants to talk over with me."

"Then what—" I began and stopped short. No use to irritate Dicky with the perfectly natural query as to why he should feel aggrieved at my staying away when he himself meant to be absent from the apartment until midnight. I knew these "dinners with art editors"—of whom Mr. Holmes is one—of old. Whether they were genuine or simply the excuse for some appointment of Dicky's of which he wished to keep me in ignorance, they were always long drawn-out affairs, which invariably occupied a whole evening.

"They suppose you telephone Betty to postpone the dinner," I said equably. "She no doubt will be very glad to have a holiday."

"You evidently share her pleasure," he retorted disagreeably. "My irritation was smothered by my sense of the ridiculous. A vision of the nerve-racking surprise of my despoiled treasures, and the fatiguing and disappointing search for a home in which I had spent my afternoon, rose before me. A holiday indeed!"

Lillian Listens. Lillian's hand stretched itself over my shoulder toward the receiver. "When you're through," she whispered, "I'd like to tell him something."

I resigned the receiver with alacrity, glad indeed of the chance to terminate my conversation with my husband. I did not wish to tell him of the marauders of the night before, neither did I wish to get into any quarrel with him. And I knew that the letter was exceedingly likely to happen if I talked to him much longer. "Oh, Dicky-bird!" Lillian's voice was crisp and emphatic. "If you will save me a long distance call from out here to Betty, as Madge suggests, I shall be eternally grateful. You see, I'm getting terribly economical, a positive miser. What's that? Yes, I'll listen."

She listened attentively, then laughed heartily. "Strike one!" she said. "I acknowledge the corn. Now that you've got it out of your system, please remember to telephone Betty THIS MINUTE—write it on your cuff in red ink, or something like that—that none of us are coming home to dinner, but that we'll be there tomorrow night. I hope that includes you, too. All right! Take care of yourself. So long!" The Dicky-bird chirps sapiently.

Visitor

Mrs. Donald V. Baxter.

A charming visitor is Mrs. Donald V. Baxter of Grand Rapids, Mich., who arrived in Omaha Wednesday morning from her home to spend two weeks with her parents, Judge and Mrs. W. W. Slabaugh. Mrs. Baxter was before her marriage about two years ago, Miss Grace Slabaugh. A number of the younger matrons are planning entertainments to be given in honor of this guest during her short stay, while each one present made a wish.

she said, "that as I am always about two cents and five mills behind the financial game, he would like to inquire how I'm going to do the miser stunt. And he's about right."

No Use Opposing Her. Her lips were smiling, her face serene, but I wondered if my vision had betrayed me, or if I had for a fleeting instant beheld a shadow in her brave eyes. Was it possible that Lillian had any fear of her financial future? I knew that she spent money lavishly, and that she was generous to a fault, but I also knew that she earned sums which to my eyes seemed enormous. But still—

I put the thought carefully aside for future consideration and gave all my attention to what she was saying. "Here's a comfortable corner," she decided, drawing me to one side of the really commodious and well appointed "candy kitchen."

"Now to relax for ten minutes. Here's to my favorite dissipation, an egg phosphate. I do hope that sweet darling with the droopy, curling locks knows how to make a decent one."

The youth she thus characterized regarded us indolently and superciliously, when the waitress repeated our order to him. Lillian had specified cracked ice. "I was two years on Broadway," he announced to the waitress in a tone that was evidently for our benefit. "And they probably know less on Broadway about making appetizing soft drinks than on any other street in the civilized world!" Lillian grumbled under her breath, "I feel it my bones, Madge; that I'm going to be treated to a glass of dish water."

But the phosphate was surprisingly good, according to Lillian's own verdict. "I take it all back," she said, sipping it with all the relish of a gourmandizing child. "The beautiful creature can do something besides curl her front hair. No—putting out a quick hand and gathering up the checks which had been laid beside us—"those are mine."

No use to oppose her. I had learned that long ago. It takes thought and skill to circumvent Lillian's determination to foot the bills upon all outings. But as I stood by helplessly and watched her pay not only for the soda counter charges, but for the bonuses we took to Mrs. Durice and Marion, I wondered if there were not the relation of cause and effect between this habit of hers and the shadow I had surprised in her eyes but a few minutes before.
