Then he carefully carried their bodies out of the house to the rear of a barn and with the aid of a lantern uried them in a shallow grave which he dug. He spent that night in the home of his murdered relatives and remained in the neighborhood for several days. When the disappearance of his brother and his wife became known Barker, questioned, told several different stories which finally resulted in his arrest, his subsequent conviction and hanging.

Meets Death Calmly.

During the four years he spent in the penitentiary after the commission of the crime and execution, Barker never once was confined in the death cell. He occupied a cell, the same as ordinary prisoners, worked with them in the shops and enjoyed the privileges they enjoyed. At no time during the full four-year period did Barker collapse and show any outward signs of remorse for his crime. He bravely walked to the gallows and with the same air of bravado that had marked his every action, stood calmly while the hangman's knot was fixed, the black cap adjusted and the trap sprung.

But one month before the execution of Barker, Harrison Clark, colored, of Omaha, was executed for the murder of Edward Flurry, a street car conductor of Omaha. Flurry was murdered on the night of March 8, 1906, at the Albright street car "Y" during a holdup-He died nine days later in a local hospital.

During the time that he was held in the prison, Clark contented himself ith the strumming of a guitar which Warden Beemer permitted him to 1: - p in his cell. At no time did he display any emotion or remorse for his crime, but at every opportunity he protested that he was innocent of the crime for which he was convicted.

Immediately following his last meal Clark called for a cigar, which was given him. Shortly after, while talking with newspapermen, he delivered a speech in which he warned against the use of intoxicating liquor. Following this he picked up his guitar and continued to strum it while waiting for the arrival of the guards to start the death march. As he left his cell on the way to the gallows, he continued to puff on his cigar. He puffed the cigar on the scaffold while his arms and legs were being tied by executioner's assistants and did not throw it away until the black cap was pulled down over Prince was convicted at Lincoln of the murder of Deputy Warden Davis on February 11, 1912, while he was serving a sentence of 121/4 years. The murder occurred in the assembly room of the prison. Davis, who was on duty in the assembly room, was stabbed by Prince as the negro passed him on his way out of the room to go to his cell. The murder was committed with a knife stolen from the broom factory. Davis was so seriously wounded that he died a few hours later.

The murder preceded the outbreak of "Shorty" Gray and his gang, with their subsequent murders, by about six weeks.

Prince spent his last days in the death cell writing poetry. His final statement, aside from several letters and poems that he had written while in the death cell, was: "When I fall to my death my soul will go straight up to

Cole and Grammer were executed December 20 of the last year more than four and a half years after the body of the woman for whose murder they paid the supreme penalty, was found slain near Elba, Neb. Their fight for their lives from the justice court to the supreme court of the United States set a record for legal fights in an effort to escape the death penalty.

Four years after the murder of the aged Mrs. Lulu Vogt two men paid the supreme penalty. An out-raged state had exacted payment for the breaking of one of its oldest laws, and once again had the scriptural text, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" been fulfilled.

Thus does the state inflict the death penalty, and whether its exaction serves its purpose to act as a deterrent for others, I leave to the best judgment of those who read this.
