Revelations of a Wife

The Way Madge Broke the News to Dicky. "Who is this, please? I didn't catch the name." Dicky's voice, courteous, vaguely interested, came over the telephone to me. I had hurried so fast, with Katie's aid, through the cleaning of the bedrooms, that I was fairly breathless when I got into my car to drive to the station. And the knowledge that I had barely time to make my telephone connection before the hour for Lillian's train made me so nervous that I have no doubt my voice was unnatural. At any rate, Dicky did not recognize it, and for a minute I had a ridiculous school of lish impulse to pretend that I was some one else, to find out just how far that shad-owy interest in his tone would carry.

Fortunately, however, my anity intervened to save me from so bana a proceeding, and I answered him in my usual formula

"It is 1, Madge." I wondered if it were my finagination or if the interest really vanished from my, husband's tone. was a familiar note in his voice. however, an irritated, ironical inflection, which was anything but

"Oh! You!" he exclaimed. "I must be getting popular out in Marvin. Her Fluffiness called me inst a few minutes ago, and now you are favoring me., What's on your mind, old dear?"

His tone, which I knew reflected his mood, was not the one I should have wished for the reception of news such as I had to give him. I temporized; putting off the evil mo ment as long as possible,

"Of course, you're coming out to dinner?" I ventured. "Why the 'of course," he answered crossly, "It's a wonder some of you brilliant intellects out there wouldn't think to let me know about Alf's homecoming before his train time.
