What Lillian Brought From the City. Lillian-with a pasteboard box in rither hand, held by one of the small wooden handles which shops attach to big bundles-alighted from the train as I drew up my car to the station platform. I had just had time to make it after my telephone message to Dicky, and I looked nervously over my shoulder as I stopped my car to see if the offifor I knew that I had gone well over the speed limit allowed protor vehicles in the village streets. It was evidently my lucky day, however, and I sprang to the platform, hastening to take one of the packages from Lillian. I knew that she must be warm, dusty and tired, but I could have deduced not one of the three from her appearance. She was as placid, as tresh-looking as, if she had just stepped from her bedroom door after completing her toilet for the day.

"I'd like to see you lighting a five some day," I said a bit viciously as we turned toward the car, "But I suppose you'd emerge as unruffled and peaceful as a summer morning.
