Do Kites Fly? While we are accustomed to think of the air as an almost impalpable substance without weight or power of itself, it is not only quite heavy, but it possesses the faculty of supporting things to a degree that is a little short of amazing, as a study of a flying kite will demonstrate, The kite has so wings like a bird, nor has it the assistance of a light gas like a balloon. Yet it remains aloft and exerts a strong pull upon the cord which connects it with the person who is operating it. That this power of flying is not inherent in the material from which the kite is made is apparent from the fact it will drop at once to the ground.

that if we roll the paper or cloth which makes up the kite into a ball, The answer to the apparent para dox lies in the fact that the paper or cloth is spread out so as to form a wide area against which the air can push, thus exerting a considerable portion of its ability to support things. Even on a fairly calm day a kite can be flown by running along Si. 800.

If through some misfortune you ould be called upon to meet a large and unexpected expenditure tomorrow, how would you do it? Supposing it should be discovered that you or some of your family must submit to a serious operation

And so you go your way making no special effort to be ready. If you have to wait for sad experiences in order to learn the necessity for preparedness you may have companions in misery, but it won't make the results of your short-sight-

Where It Started The Air Pump.

air pump, or vacuum pump,

which plays so important a part in the manufacture of electric light bulbs, was first invented by Otto von Guericke, about 1654. His mechanical pump was superseded by a mercury pump, which used the principle of the baronteter. Time pump, by which a very high degree of vacuum was obtained was invented by Geisler in 1855.
