Whist.

The game of whist was originally called "triumph," and was played in England as early as 1529, when it was mentioned in the Christmas sermon of Bishop Latimer in Cambridge. Definite rules were formed from meetings of a group of whist players at the Crown Coifee House in London; they found definite laws incressary, and these were formulated by Edmond Hoyte, one of the players.

President-Elect Expected to Follow Lincoln's Precedent In Leaving Responsibilities to Secretaries.

By HOLLAND. When the new cabinet first gathers around the oblong table in the cabinct room, the president may not find it worth while to take heed of the example set by President Garfield at the first meeting of his secretaries. Garfield, in kindly and courteous manner and yet with a certaio seriousness, said that it was expected by him and should be the understanding by them that each would be oyal, not seeking in any way subsequent preferment for himself. Some years later one of cabinet members who heard comment from the president said:
