Appreciation Of Modern Art

By MAURICE BLOCK.

In order to understand modern paintings we must realize that painting of all the arts is most sensitive to the social changes of our time. Art is essentially a social expression and reflects in a large measure the character of its age.

Science has revolutionized every phase of modern life. It has mastered man's comforts and it has changed the very order of his being. Through scientific discoveries in optics impressionism came into being. The painting of light, which was the greatest achievement in the history of painting since the discovery of perspective. Impressionism at once became the almost universal creed over the entire western world. It revitalized painting.

Then science led the artist into still newer fields of expression, into the world of abstract forces and ideas where he seeks to express motion, complexity, sound, sensations, etc. Almost countless isms have sprung up all having at base the same principle. Summed up in a few words they aim to communicate sensations rather than to relate facts; to interpret life rather than to record it. This struggle has been in force some 30 years. What will come of it all we are too near to predict. That the large majority of these artists are serious men there can be no doubt. We are stupefied by their efforts. Without seeking to understand them, we rely on the future to be their judge. But our discomfiture is increased in the realm of music and poetry where the same forces are at work and we realize vaguely that some metamorphosis is upon us.

We have only to go back into the last century to find that many of the artists, such as Ingres, whom we now call academic, Corot and Delacroix fought the same fierce battle for their ideals as our moderns are now engaged in, and under the same condemning criticism, "monstrous," "vandal," "absurd." Throughout the 19th century each new period of painting departed from the rules held sacred before its and though up only a short while thought the ride quite fascinating. She hopes to go soon again.

Mrs. Donald Macrae is also very enthusiastic regarding this mode of travel and after her first flight immediately began making arrangements for a trip of considerable length.

time, and yet each has come into recognition.

All of this leads us to reflect that times change; we are different from our grandfathers; we are placed in essentially different environment. It is right that we should be; the very fact of life means growth and change. It would seem that in the process of change we require certain landmarks, like the old homestead, to remain unchanged, and since the artistic perception is exercised in so limited a way by the average man, his tendency in that line is nonprogressive. The fact remains that as the capacity for accepting new ideas in modern business prolongs the life of a man in that business, so the same capacity with regard to life, art, philosophy, etc., enriches life and maintains through its maturity a certain vision to meet the new and changing order.

The collection of paintings now being exhibited at the library by the Omaha Society of Fine Arts presents the life work of an artist in a manner in which we are seldom privileged to see it. Here is a man of unquestioned capacity and endowed with a supreme sensitiveness. He gives us in his youth the familiar harbor scenes which respond to our casual vision. They please us because we can comprehend them at a glance and without exercising any mental energy. The artist reaches certain heights in this period, it is true, but he is restlessly easting about for a medium. Then he refreshes us with a vision of color; light has taken possession of him. The series he calls "Pools" is before us, vibrant with life and light. Here the artist interprets nature through a more evolved and sensitive vision. Then, just as Whistler did, he delved into the rich mine of oriental art and thought. What he learned there he has told us in his figure and still life compositions. He is no longer impetuous, but certain and contemplative. The adaptation of oriental thought in the figure pieces is also gotten masterly; these are portraits in a new sense, the figures taking their places amid groupings of oriental units in harmonious compositions. In his still life groups he has given his most profound expression. He feels in the primitive carved and polychromed saints and in the pottery of the old Persians something of that quiet reverential dignity that renders them capable of conveying his greatest message to the world. One feels by the conviction and strength of his painting that the artist must have worked under pressure of very strong feeling and that what he registered was himself, the objects painted being but the vehicle of his emotions.
