For Rust.
The onion is a friend in need at times and an enemy at others, but a new use to many is in connection with rust. If the article which is rusted is rubbed with the onion peel and left with the juice on it for 24 hours, then polished with turpentine, the rust will disappear.

What's What
By HELEN DECIE

A well-bred man or woman never appears to notice a blunder made by any individual in a social group, whether the blunder is a revelation of ignorance or of mere tactlessness. The halibred and illbred—what the English call "the underbred"—invariably affect a superior air when any one makes a "break." This is shown by open comment or equally open exchange of glances of amusement, which cruelly emphasize and advertise the involuntary lapse. So far from lending superiority, an action of this sort classifies its perpetrator as a vulgarian, inferior to the blunderer, since it is always a "under false step" to attract attention to the faux-pas of another.
In polite society the first impulse of the thoroughbred is to conceal a break of this sort—to bridge it over with diverting talk. This instinctive protection of weakness is one of the surest indications of that innate chivalry which produces nothing less than consistently noble courtesy.

Passing the Plate
Mrs. Mean—I have nothing but praise for the new minister. Deacon—So I noticed when the plate went around.

Dresser Drawers

Even for the tidy women, it requires effort to keep the dresser drawers in order. They demand constant attention if they would be slightly and the contents be preserved from "mussing." Many a dresser contains a varied assortment of boxes in which small accessories are kept. If cretonne pockets are made similar to a shoe pocket, only made in strips to run around the inside of the drawer, it will greatly facilitate the matter and give more drawer space.

A Window Garden

Do not this spring deny yourself the inspiration and joy that come from a tiny bit of garden. Even though you live in a hall bedroom you can have a window-box or a few potted plants. There are many plants that do not require much sunshine, in fact, that thrive better in the shade. Among these are certain ferns and varieties of ivy. Any florist can advise you.

Care of Books

If the leather bindings of books are rubbed with a little plain sweet oil the leather will not crack and break.
There is a certain amount of animal oil left in all leather and exposure to dust and air will in time cause it to evaporate. So books kept in open cases require constant care.
