

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

The Things Madge Found in the House to Which She Went Alone.

As I backed the car out of the garage and swung it toward the road I was more disturbed than I cared to admit by Katie's prophecy that I "might laugh on one side of face" before I came back from my trip to the house, concerning the sale of which I had just received a telephone message. But as I sped along through the bracing, wonderful spring air my common sense asserted itself, and I laughed aloud at poor Katie's movie-born theories. Following minutely the directions which the girl had given me over the telephone, I soon came to the property which I judged to be the one described to me. The road it faced was a winding, rather picturesque one, and the nearest house in any direction from the one in front of which I drew up my car was a small, tumble-down structure, at least five hundred feet down the road. The property itself, I decided in a swift, comprehensive survey, was not half-bad, being attractively landscaped with drives and groupings of pines and shrubs. Nearly an acre of ground surrounded the house, which was a frame structure, with plenty of veranda room and many windows.

I received no answer to my knocking on the front door, so I went to the side door. Through the glass I saw a slender, middle-aged, well-dressed woman sitting in a rocking chair, looking vacantly through the window. She paid no attention to my first knock, and as I repeated it more loudly the thought crossed my mind that she must be deaf. At the second knock, however, she looked up with annoyance mingled with the stupidity mirrored on her face, and as she moved toward the door I saw that her feet were shoeless, through the golf shoes that covered them were of the finest quality, the most fashionable shade.

I saw something else, too, as she opened the door, or rather my nose told me first, as I caught a whiff of her breath. Her look of stupidity was explained, she had been drinking and that rather heavily. If my brain had not issued a peremptory command to my feet to stay where they were I am afraid they would have carried me precipitately down the steps, I dread, infinitely, the proximity of a drunken person.

Strange Tenants
"What do you want?" she asked, with the slow, hesitant articulation of the person who knows that speech is unsteady and betraying.

"I am afraid I have the wrong house," I said, glad of any excuse to get away. "I am Mrs. Richard Graham of Marvin, and some one telephoned me an hour ago that a certain property was for sale. I—"

"Oh!" She surveyed my owl-like face with the exclamation, "Thash all right. A girl was here—some where she looked about vacantly—and she did telephone, and told me you'd be here, and that I was to do—"

"Do you live here?" I asked. She turned a suspicious look on me.

"Where else should I live?" she demanded irritably, then fell again into her heaviness of manner. "Yes, I live here, me—and my little dogs, and my husband," she added, evidently as an after-thought.

That she was a breeder and fancier of thoroughbred dogs I saw before we had proceeded, a few steps from the room I had entered. Tiny woolly dogs were everywhere, sick ones in baskets, mothers with litters of puppies on soft beds in boxes, groups of others in improvised kennels in the kitchen, while from the upper regions proceeded the yapping of others. And yet, to do her justice, she had managed her kennels so well that she had not spoiled the house as I had at first decided she must have done.

I followed her from room to room, now deciding that the house would never do, again admiring some feature of it, wondering if we could not make it do. I put some judicious questions to her. She stopped and leaned against a window, regarding me with the owl-like look I had found so ludicrous.

"Now, I'm not trying to knock the house y'understand," she said solemnly, "but I've taken a fancy to you, dearie, and I'm not going to let the agent put anything over on you. In the first place, don't you think if the house was any good we'd have bought it? Had the money to pay cash for it. But the plumbing is awful, all old and falling to pieces and we've burned twenty tons of coal so far, and it's a mild winter, too, and the neighbor on one side is going to turn her place into a pigery this summer, hundreds of pigs, and the man on the other side is a truck gardener, and he piles loads of fertilizer next the fence—brings loads of flies—"

A Surprise
I interrupted her with a little shudder of disgust.

"Thank you so much for telling me these things," I said. "Of course I shall not want the house. And I must not keep you longer."

"There was something else I was to tell you," she said vacantly, "but I can't think what it was."

"Never mind about it now, Linda," a voice that I recognized said, behind me. "I'll tell Mrs. Graham the rest."

I wheeled, to look into the face of Grace Draper.

WHY

Are Some Winds Hot and Others Cold?

Like man, nature can "blow hot or cold" with the same breath, though it is sometimes amazing to note the difference in temperature between winds of equal velocity but widely varying degrees of heat. But, when we think of a cold, piercing gale, the words "north wind" immediately come into our minds, and, similarly, a hot dry movement of the air causes us to think of a "south wind" and in the names themselves lies the explanation of much of the variation in temperature.

If it were possible to have a wind which had not passed over any portion of the earth, or had not been changed in temperature by reason of the altitude or other contributing cause, we would find that as nothing more than a movement of the air, which, of itself and by itself, differs not at all from the surrounding atmosphere. The wind would be neither hot nor cold, though its effect would be cooling on account of the way in which it stimulated evaporation. But the moment air starts to move across a hot or cold surface, it immediately absorbs some of the heat or coldness, carrying at least a portion of this with it on its journey. The "north wind," of course, has swept over some position of the earth which is almost certainly colder than the section toward which it blows, and, similarly, the "south wind" brings with it some of the warmth of the earth heated by the more direct rays of the sun. Wind has its origin in the inequalities of temperature, which, in turn, lead to more or less rapid alterations of the air, the heated portion of the atmosphere tending to rise upward, and the colder portion dropping toward the earth. Nature strives always for an equality, and the warm breezes and cold blasts are one of the ways in which she tends to equalize matters.

To remove grease spots from leather, bags, belts, etc., apply the white of a raw egg to the grease mark and dry it in the sun. Then gently rub with a clean cloth.

Dog Hill Paragrafs

Raz Barlow left everybody at the store today in a deep study when he told them how he stopped a runaway horse. He said he was driving a western pony which ran away with him and his girl in the buggy. He pulled so hard both lines broke, and as the mad animal was dashing wildly toward a washed out bridge over a creek, he boldly reached down over the spatter-board, seized the animal firmly by its hind legs and brought it to a sudden stop about two inches this side of the precipice. Fletcher Herstep's corn crop was such a failure last season nearly every rat he had left him this winter.

Parents' Problems

Will it harm children to eat snow? Take a teaspoonful of snow; melt it, and look at the result. Snow looks white, but, unfortunately, that whiteness does not mean cleanliness. As the snow falls, it catches the dust and germs in the air. Children should not eat dust and germs!
