Love at First Sight. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am in love with a girl whom I know only by sight and from friends I have learned she cares for me.

Worked: I should think you would be worried if your object in marrying this man is to get some of his property.

Dixie: Everything you tell me indicates that the young man cares for you. He says he does and he comes to see you three times or more a week.

Jewel: The engagement and wedding rings are worn on the third finger of the left hand, that is the finger next to the little finger.

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

Why Madge Hesitated to Accede to Grace Draper's Request. "So terribly wronged."

For a minute Grace Draper's pleading, anguished face vanished from my vision, while over and over in my ears sounded the phrase she had just used for the second time since she had accosted me in the upper hall of the house I had come to inspect.

What did she mean by this phrase, or rather what meaning did she expect me to glean from it. Did she intend me to believe—I clenched my fingers into my palms at the thought which had come to me, I had harbored it when I had received the letter she had written me in which she had used a similar expression. It was with an effort that I said:

"What do you mean by terribly wronged?" Her eyelids drooped quickly, covering her eyes for an instant before she answered. Again the insistent little doubt at the back of my brain forced itself upon me. Was she compelled to hide the expression of her eyes until she could be sure of controlling them? Was she deliberately hiding them so I might gain the impression that she meant to conceal something? Or was her action the result of an embarrassment, a shame, which was genuinely swaying her?

"You—ought—to—know," she said at last, her voice broken, husky, and in the pause before her next utterance I imagined that the beating of my heart could be heard, so violently was it thumping against my side.

"You—know—how hard I tried— vainly, of course—to win your husband from you, and—how they said—I tried—to—get—him—killed—that time his airplane fell. But they lied. I didn't—I didn't, yet they put me in prison for it."

Memory's Warning. No drooping eyelids now! Her eyes, imploring, anguished, looked straight into mine, almost compelling a belief in her sincerity. Her hands were twisted horribly together, as if she had pulled them out of shape in their clutch one upon the other. I think I should have surrendered utterly to her appeal if it had not been for a memory which shall never know. All I ask is pardon from you, and the chance to drag out my drab existence free from terror. Surely you can give me those.

Again there sounded in my brain a tiny note of warning. But it was faint, so light in the scale as compared with the weight of the girl's tragic abased appeal, that I put it aside and stretched out my hands impulsively toward her. Her pitifully contrasting of her lot with mine had broken down my last barrier.

"My pardon I give you freely," I said simply, for in honesty I could not disclaim the truth that she had injured me almost beyond forgiveness. "And tell me how I can be of assistance to you."

She caught my hands in hers and bent over them. I was afraid she meant to kiss them, and though I forgave her, I felt that I couldn't bear the touch of her lips. But hot tears, not kisses fell upon them, and I heard her broken murmur of thankfulness. When at last she lifted her head a look of quiet peace had succeeded the anguish which had been portrayed in her face.

"The forgiveness means most to me," she said, and if ever sincerity showed in a face it appeared to speak from hers. "And there is only one bit of assistance that I need from you or shall ever ask from you."

"And that is—"

"A touch of the old mockery twisted her lip."

"That you call off your faithful Fidos."

(Continued Tomorrow.) Informal Bridge Mrs. Fred Devereux will entertain at bridge informally, Thursday afternoon, at her home. Two tables will be placed for the game.
