Problems That Perplex

Answered by BEATRICE FAIRFAX

Rather Difficult.
Dear Miss Fairfax: I am 18 and greatly attached to a man four years my senior. He has asked me to marry him, and I would consent but for one reason. My sister, now 21, went about with him, and though he no longer cares for her she loves him dearly. Now, Miss Fairfax, should I give up my happiness for my sister, or what shall I do? ANXIOUS.

I'm afraid you can't avoid temporary unhappiness for at least one of you three. Do you love this boy? Are you old enough to mean to settle down to marriage? Is there enough depth of feeling to justify you in fighting for happiness at the cost of a certain amount of humiliation for your sister? I'm not saying she won't get over it. Most folks find time and change a most excellent healer. But keeping her disappointment right under her eyes won't make it any pleasanter for your sister.

His Parents Object.
Dear Miss Fairfax: I am 23 and am now graduating from a professional college. I have loved a young girl of good standing, ability and character for two years. I hope to marry her, but my parents consistently tell me she is poor and inferior. I love this girl dearly and she loves me.

A. B.
The man who marries for money is a despicable and, as a boy, not one degree more unpleasant than the girl who sells herself. Your parents are ambitious for you. Fired by their love they want you to have the tangible assets of life—the material good. If you're a real man you can work and win these symbols of success. But the girl who is a woman is above rubies. If you haven't the courage to fight for it you will, I fear, never realize your full stature as a man.

Family vs. Sweetheart.
Dear Miss Fairfax: For several months I have known a young lady two months my junior and love her dearly. I have proposed marriage and have been accepted both by her and her parents. My mother adores this girl and my father thinks the same, but they cannot tolerate her family.

The girl's family is large with aunts and uncles all living in the same neighborhood. They occasionally quarrel, and for that reason my father has asked me to give her up. I have given my word to this girl that I will marry her. It is her happiness that is my desire to wed her.

T. O. S.
Have the courage of your convictions and be true to your best feeling. Since the girl herself is fine and loyal, and since your parents confess that they have "nothing against her, why should she suffer because of their failure to get on with her people? Think your family is talking a bit, but will give in if they are made to feel that you have the strength to stick to the one you love.

Mrs. Johnson Re-elected.
Mrs. Edward Johnson was re-elected leader of the literature department of the Omaha Woman's club at a meeting held at her home Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. George Bonner was re-elected assistant leader; Mrs. James Hanbury is the new secretary and treasurer, and Mrs. W. S. Knight, librarian.

Louise Homer Weds.
Miss Louise Homer, daughter of Madame Louise Homer, noted singer, and Sidney Homer, well known composer, was married on Tuesday in New York City to Ernest Van Rensselaer Stiles. The bride is herself a singer and appeared in concert in Omaha earlier in the season with her mother.

Garfield Circle.
Garfield Circle No. 11, Ladies of the G. A. R. will meet in Memorial hall, court house, Friday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

The quality will prove a pleasing surprise and you'll be more than satisfied with the size. "NEW CURRENCY" Sc Cigar.—Adv.

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

What Grace Draper Wrung From Madge.

I stiffened, offended, at Grace Draper's flippant reference to my "faithful Fidos," following so closely upon my granting of her appeal for pardon. But before I could speak she had redeemed her lapse into her old mocking vernacular with quick contrition.

"Oh, please forgive me for speaking that way!" she cried, distressed. "But if you had been married from pillar to post the way I have, every innocent act and word distorted, and every motion impudently interpreted, I don't believe you would have much reverence or liking for the people doing it."

"I am afraid I do not understand," I said a trifle stiffly.

"She looked at me steadily. "Do you mean that you do not know the espionage to which I have been subjected on your account since I was released?" she asked.

I flushed involuntarily at the question, realizing that I had no right to betray my knowledge of any actions other than my own.

"I know—nothing." I returned steadily, with the specious mental reservation that indeed I knew nothing which I could tell her.

A spark of the old fire gleamed in her eyes at my answer, and I felt that she fathomed my subterfuge. But it vanished as suddenly as it appeared, and her manner when she spoke again was one of entire belief in my assertion.

A Surprise.
"No—I don't believe you do," she said slowly, then with a rush of words, "I ought not to tell you—if you wished you could make a great deal of trouble for me by repeating what I'm going to say, but I don't believe you will."

"The stopped and eyed me hesitatingly. I wondered if she were going to ask me to promise silence, but instead, she hurried on.

"Ever since I left the prison I have known that I was under constant surveillance," she said, "and I found out—no matter how—that four different persons were strongly interested in all my doings. When I tell you that the names of those four persons are Allen Drake, Hugh Grantland, Harry and Lillian Underwood, you will not wonder, I think, that I realized their interest in my doings was simply interest in you."

One item alone of her little speech surprised me, and that was her introduction of Harry Underwood's name. I had thought him the length of a continent away, yet she had spoken with such decision I could not doubt her knowledge. He must be in the vicinity of New York.

No time now, however, to speculate upon this surprising bit of information. Grace Draper's voice went on hurriedly, unevenly.

"Every step was dogged, every movement known," she said. "I admit I was foolish. I was so angry when I found it out that I deliberately tried to make them believe from several little things that I actually meant you harm. And then when I came to myself I realized that there could be no peace or rest for me until I started clean again, with your forgiveness as one of the things which would help wipe off the slate. I found myself baffled at every attempt to see you."

Madge's Promise.
She stopped, and the inevitable question sprang to my lips.

"How is it then that you accomplished this meeting so easily?" I wondered if it were triumph that flickered in her eyes for a moment.

"That will have to remain my secret," she said. "Otherwise I should have to betray a trust placed in me. But part of my success lies in the fact that I have been as actionless as a seashell ever since I returned from the South. The most active cat doze at the mice holes sometimes."

There was a hint of satisfaction in her manner. I wondered idly if it were justified, or whether the four persons she had named were indeed as blind as she had named were indeed as blind as she evidently believed them to be. That they could have no knowledge of my present interview I believed, else it would have been stopped before this. But that they would not long remain in ignorance of her success in seeing me I was certain knowing their resourcefulness and determination as I did. And when they did learn of the trick she had used to secure an interview with me, what penalty would they visit upon her?

"Can't you imagine how intolerable such espionage is?" she said fiercely. "And I have meant no harm, mean none now. All I wish is to be allowed to live quietly and earn my living as best I can. They will never believe me, but I think they will believe you if you can tell them that you have seen me—don't tell them the trick I played, say it was an accidental meeting—and that you are convinced I mean no harm. Won't you do that for me?"

I shut my ears relentlessly to the little note of warning still sounding, though faintly, in my brain. I told myself that I could not afford to waver. The door of hope against a creature so downed by fate as this.
