Since Wall street always insists on the assignment of a definite cause, the critical aspects of the English labor dispute were naturally brought forward. The extremely disturbing possibilities of the attitude maintained by the unions in that quarrel are apparant to anybody, and it is reasonable to assume an unfavorable influence from it, even on financial sentiment in our own country. It would naturally emphasize the spirit of hesitation which makes possible the downward movement of prices.

Increase in Cotton.

Some interesting light is thrown on the obscure cotton trade situation by the census bursaux monthly report of exports and home consumption. Our home mills took in March, a substantially larger amount of cotton than in any month since last September; the increase as compared with the worst month of the textile industry, last December, being 43,852 bales, or nearly 15 per keent. This enlargement of spinners' purchases has progressed uninterruptedly during 1921, month by month.

But on the other hand, exports of cotton in March were very much the smallest of any months since last September and 413,398 bales below December and if exports and home consumption are added together, even December's argregate takings for the trade was 270,000 bales greater than last rouths. This means that in the problem of supply and demand, even the considerable recovery in the dome the textile industry has not offeet the simultaneous shrinkage of foreign Increase in Cotton.
