Holding a Husband Adele Garrison's New Phase of

Revelations of a Wife The Way Lillian and Madge Began

Their Quest. That last hour with Dicky in the Marvin home will always be one of my tenderest memories. As if determined to make up for his previous thoughtlessness he devoted to me every second of the time remaining before my trip to the east end of the island. And when Dicky is in a remorseful mood he is wonderful in his exquisite tenderness and consideration, my royal lover, whose every word and look bring back the haleyon days of my honeymoon. Knowing Lillian's almost psychic comprehension, I was not surprised that she unobtrusively managed not only to keep every one out of our way, but to attend to all the little When the sun mounting in the heavens warned me that it was high time we were departing there was nothing for me to do but to take my seat in the car,

And then we were off-Lillian Marion and I-with Mrs. Durkee, Leila, Katie and Jim waving to us Deported to Canada Leila, Katie and Jim waving to us from the lawn, with Dicky perched upon the runningboard beside me, riding with us until we had turned the curve in the driveway where the hear, Frances Hofler, pretty native hedges sheltered us from the obserof Canada, will leave Omaha today vation of the group upon the lawn.
Then he murmured: "Stop the car a minute," and as I complied, he kissed me warmly, tenderly, with a whispered injunction: "Take care of yourself, sweetheart," and swung himself to the ground. I started on, grieved indeed at giving up the home I had loved so well, but with a far lighter heart than an hour or two before I had deemed possible to possess.

With characteristic tact Lelian. who sat in the tonneau of the car with Marion, kept absolutely silent until we were well out of the village limits. Then Marion began to chatter questions and exclamations upon the things which interested her along the road, and I knew that her mother had removed the ban of silence which she must have put upon the child as Dicky left us. Gradually I pulled my emotional self together. The elixir of the grow-ing grass, the first tender leaves of the trees in their exquisite shadings of green, the thready tassels of the maples, all the magic of the springtime stole into my veins, and with a tender, amused laugh I took advantage of a wide, clear stretch of drawing up an answer to his wife's road to turn my head slightly to-suit in which he recommended a de- ward the back seat. "The demon is exorcised," I said gayly. "You don't need to go around on mental tiptoes any longer, you blessed, understanding woman! From now on I'm a pioneer seeking a new home."

Marion's Request.

"If we only had a white canvas-covered trailer," Lillian rejoined, wisely ignoring everything but the last part of the sentence, "we'd be more in the picture. Do you know that's what I'm going to do some day, start off on a motor jaunt with a trailer bearing tents and every requirement for camping."

"I'll go with you as soon as Junior gets beyond the croup and colic stage," I answered. "True, he's never had either of them, but-" "You're living in hopes," Lillian suggested slyly, and in the laugh which followed her sally I dropped the last vestige of my dolor, and set my face steadfastly toward the fascinating uncertainty which awaited and we did not stop it until we were well past Patchogue and in the delightful region known as "The Moriches." Then I spoke over my shoulder to Lillian.

"I think it isn't far now," Lillian answered. "Oh, Auntie Madge! I'd know that little road we turned down, any-where," Marion carolled. "If you'll drive terrible slow I'll tell you when you're coming to it."

"All right, Marion," I returned fondly. "I'll drive just as slow as my engine will let me." We crawled along accordingly at a rate that would have satisfied the most captious traffic officer in a crowded city, and soon came to the winding wood road branching off from the main one of which we all

I turned the car into its grass grown pathway, and ran several hundred feet around its winding curves until we were entirely out of sight loose in the country. "Oh, mother! Auntie Madge!" she
