W HEN you order soap you don't call for just "soap" -you ask, by name, for the kind you prefer.

When you call for washing powder you ask for a certain brand.

Yet, when it comes to the important matter of bread-something on which the family health may depend-

many people are careless in saying: "Send a loaf

Don't Say

"BETSY ROSS"

Is the bread you and your loved ones eat, then, of less importance than the soap you use or the washing powder you employ?

Bread is a food that plays an important part in every meal. All members of the family partake of it; children eat much of it.

Is it of no concern that the bread on your table should be of pure ingredients, made under clean surroundings and bear full food value?

All bread is by no means alike. Take BETSY ROSS

Bread, for instance. Here is a loaf scientifically made of carefully selected ingredients. It offers the maximum in food value for child or grown-up. You should call for BETSY ROSS by name. Only so can you be sure of bread that answers to your ideas of goodness and healthfulness.
