OMAHA organizations are not the cold, heartless groups we have often been led to believe, but rather they are the most appreciative and wish to show their kindly spirit on all occasions. The society of Fine Arts is no exception and on Tuesday, when their president of the past two years, Mrs. Ward M. Burgess, was honor guest at a luncheon at the Country club, given by the board of directors, she was the recipient of a gift from them. Three volumes of Ruskin's "Stones of Venice" and five volumes of "Modern Painters" were found at her place when she arrived at the affair. The books were bound in Morocco leather.

What Happened Beside the Lonely Road. The young son of the car owner who had been so discourteous to us stared delightedly at Lillian when she finished her summary of his father's needs after the youth's apology for the treatment accorded us. "Oh, I say!" he exclaimed. "That's simply ripping! I never thought of Dad before in just that light. But it's the truest thing that was ever said about him. He does need something to take him down, but you see—he has—more money than is good for him," the young man's flush of embarrassment grew deeper. "There's no one who has any power over him. So I'm afraid there isn't any chance of his getting out in a corner—say, that's an awfully funny idea!" "One never knows," Lillian replied demurely, "sometimes the most unexpected things happen."

back the big machine over the winding road. It had not yet turned the first corner when the siren of a motorcycle sounded warningly, and Jones in answer sounded the powerful horn of the big machine. I saw Ted throw up his arms as a signal and spring aside into the bushes as a motorcycle came around the corner, skidded sickeningly, then came to a full stop while its uniformed rider—a slight youth not much older than Ted—fairly tumbled off. "She's a Dangerous Character," "What's the trouble here?" he asked a bit chokingly from his sudden stop. Lillian advanced to meet him. "There is no trouble," she said. "Why are you here?" "Why?" he began, musingly a bit until he caught Lillian's glance, and then suddenly changing to a more respectful tone. "A gentleman on the road outside here just called me and told me that some people were staging a riot in here and obstructing the road, and building fires and I don't know what else. He's a responsible party. I've heard of him," his tone breathed the awe of wealth and position which affects many minor officials. "Of course, I'm bound to look into things, but maybe—" "Officer!" The word sounded raucously from the throat of the pompous individual, now hot and perspiring from his hurried walk in the wake of the motorcycle. "I demand that you arrest that woman. She's a dangerous character."

The motorcycle officer hesitated, looking helplessly from Lillian to the heavily breathing owner of the big car. Ted started forward violently and paused at a warning glance from Lillian. Jones, the chauffeur, who had stopped the backing of the big car at a gesture from his employer, sat stolid as ever, watching everything from under the visor of his cap. A furtive glance at him showed me a gleam of quiet amusement in his eyes, and I knew that he anticipated seeing his haughty employer discomfited in some way.

"I Hope You Succeed." The young man looked at her searchingly again, then he laughed outright. "I hope you succeed in providing the corner," he said understandingly as he lifted his hat and went back to the big car over which the chauffeur was stooping. Jones raised himself and touched his cap as the young man approached. Then the two entered into a low-toned colloquy, dotted with chuckles and discreet glances in our direction. Jones did something mysterious just under the plate holder, the speedometer and the clock, and in a few seconds the motor as mysteriously returned to life. Then with Ted walking back to give any necessary warning, Jones began to watch her. Marion, and see what she's going to do." Every one was watching Lillian, and if we were unconsciously looking for a sensation she provided one. With her eyes fixed steadily upon the young officer, who stood nearest her, she drew from her gown a tiny badge and a card, and held them toward him and said: "You perhaps would like to know the identity of the person you are arresting." Iten's Handy Helper. Standard recipe with boiled icing: 1 c. sugar, 1/2 c. water, 1 egg white, 1 t. vanilla or 1/2 Tb. lemon juice. Add boiling water to sugar. Boil gently without stirring after boiling begins. Boil until the syrup spins a thread more than a foot in length when dropped from the spoon. While the syrup is boiling, beat the egg white until the bowl can be inverted without the egg slipping. Add the hot syrup slowly to the egg, beating constantly until the mixture is of the consistency to spread. Drop out crisp Iten Fairy Soda Crackers. If the icing becomes stiff before the marguerites are made, mix in a teaspoonful of hot water and set the bowl over the tea kettle or in any other hot place. Marguerites should be served the day they are made. If they are to be served later they should be crisped in a hot oven for a few minutes.

Variations. 1. Add to icing, just before placing it on the crackers: (1) 1/2 to 1 c. nut meats ground or cut fine. One whole nut meat may be placed on top of each marguerite. (2) 1/2 to 1 c. chopped figs, raisins, dates, pineapple or any combination. A piece of fruit may be placed on top of each marguerite. (3) 1/2 to 1 1/2 squares melted chocolate. (4) 1 c. shredded coconut. (5) 1/4 to 1/2 lb. marshmallows cut in small pieces and melted over hot water.

Just a Word About Electric Light Rates. Includes a portrait of W.G. URE, City Commissioner.

The Nebraska Power Co. asked the city commission for increased rates to give it greater revenue. The city commission decided that the company was not entitled to additional revenue.

BUT-- The commission found that certain large users of electric power were paying less than cost—some as low as 3/4 of one cent per kilowatt, while the average home consumer paid 6 cents, or seven times as much.

For Example-- In 1920 one of the large packing companies paid $122,533 for the electricity it used. The same quantity of current would have cost ordinary home consumers $682,650.

The city commission determined to wipe out this discrimination. It raised the rates of the big users and cut the rate of the "little fellow"—from 6 to 5 1/2 cents.

The big users didn't like it. They have objected. But the majority of the commission went ahead and lifted the burden from the "little fellow."

URE as City Commissioner

led the fight in the city commission. He conducted the principal investigation of light company evidence. He pointed out its flaws and weak points. He drafted the new ordinance which cut the rates.

URE is up for re-election next Tuesday. He should be re-elected.
