Problems That Perplex

Answered by BEATRICE FAIRFAX

Folks Will Have Their Little Joke.

Dear Miss Fairfax: We are two chums both 16 years of age. We are both considered very beautiful. Our beauty and gracefulness win for us many admirers. Although there are only two that we really love. They are 42 and 45 years of age.

Now, Miss Fairfax, do you think they are too old for us? One is a married man but says he will get a divorce if I will marry him.

The one my chum is in love with has been married twice before, his former wives suing him for divorce on the grounds of desertion. He is very attentive to my chum and she loves him very much.

If the man I love can get a divorce we all plan to elope as we feel that our marriage would make our parents very unhappy.

Please put this in The Omaha Bee and tell us if you think we are right in our plans to marry these men. Please don't tell us that we aren't for it would break our hearts to give them up.

How is my writing? I weigh 176 pounds and am 50 inches in height. Am I too heavy for my height? If so please tell me a good method of reducing.

SMILES AND DIMPLES. You sign yourselves well. Your letter has brought a few smiles to my face but—alas—I have no dimples.

Too Young to Marry. Dear Miss Fairfax: I have been reading your advice off and on for over two years. Some of it I find very useful while at other times I don't agree with you. I am not writing to criticize you, Miss Fairfax, but I want some good, sound advice.

I am engaged to a girl of 18. Now, Miss Fairfax, this girl is more mature than most girls two or three years older than herself and can use more common sense than most girls. Give this question some good, sound thought and tell me if she is too young to marry. Thank you, PAT.

I appreciate a thoughtful reader, and I would not believe you were one if you always agreed with me.

My answer to your question is, yes. I do think a girl of 18 is too young to marry. It may be quite true that the girl you speak of has good common sense and mature judgment but I would advise against marriage for at least two reasons, which could be greatly elaborated:

A girl of 18 has not had full opportunity to acquire the education which will fortify her all through her life as wife, mother and homemaker. She is young for the physical strain of motherhood, and for the mental care of running a house and caring for a family. Marriage is the happiest state for a woman and I even approve of a reasonably early marriage, say after 20 (though I think 22 is better), earlier and I wish all girls might marry before 25) but the girl of 18 under our present civilization has too much of the child in her to make it desirable for her to assume the really earnest responsibilities which accompany matrimony.

I think if you love the girl sincerely, you will encourage her to enjoy a little more of her girlhood, in the meantime getting ready for the home and happiness which may be yours later on.

W. C. T. U. Frances Willard W. C. T. U. will meet Wednesday at 10 a. m. with Mrs. T. R. Ward, 2121 Wirt street. Luncheon will be served at 12:30 by the domestic science department. During the afternoon members will sew for the Child Welfare department.

Mrs. Catt Not to Speak at Lincoln

Word has been received from Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt that she will be unable to attend the state convention of the Nebraska League of Women Voters in Lincoln June 7-9. Mrs. C. H. Dietrich of Hastings, state president, made every effort to secure this famous suffrage leader, but received definite word Saturday of her inability to attend. The University of Nebraska has sent for Maud Wood Park of Boston, head of the league, offering to pay all expenses of her trip if she will come to conduct the citizenship school offered by this institution to the League of Women Voters.

League of Women Voters Plans Convention

Mrs. C. H. Dietrich of Hastings, president of the Nebraska League of Women Voters, announces that the state convention of the Nebraska League is to be held in Lincoln June 7, 8 and 9, immediately following the university commencement. The dates selected will make possible a larger attendance from out in the state and it is hoped, more speakers of national prominence available for the program of the convention and the citizenship school which will take up the latter part of the meeting. The three days' program, in which the league and the university will cooperate, will keep the delegates busy. The first day will be given over to reports of committees, a survey of the organization and plans for a more effective year ahead. Wednesday morning officers will be elected and the machinery set going on plans for future activities. Prof. A. A. Reed of the university extension department will have charge of an "Institute for Political Education" on the afternoons and evenings of June 8 and 9. In addition to furnishing the best talent to be found on their faculty the university will also secure one national speaker for the school, according to Mrs. Dietrich. The Lincoln league, under the leadership of Mrs. E. F. Pettis, promises a few pleasant social features whenever they will not be in the way of either the business of the convention or the sessions of the school, which everybody is expected to attend.

Hadassah Election. Mrs. A. J. Miller was elected president of the Hadassah society at the annual election of the organization last Thursday. Other officers for the year are Mrs. A. HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

What "Mis' Skeesick" Wailed. The gray-haired woman rushing toward us from the house across the road kept shrieking shrilly and continuously. Lillian, Mrs. Ticer and I ran down the steps to meet her and ascertain the extent of the injuries which had caused her terrifying, blood-bedabbled aspect. Lillian and I stopped at a little, choking sound from Marion. The child had followed us and was evidently making a heroic effort to be brave, but her winsome little face was drained of all color, and her eyes were wide with terror. To the child, who had been so sheltered from all unpleasantness, the sight of the woman on the lawn must have been one fraught with horror. Lillian drew her small daughter into her arms, pressed the child's face into the hollow of her shoulder, effectually shutting out the sight of the shrieking woman, and spoke to me softly over Marion's head. "I shall have to stay here," she said, "until I quiet her. There are two of you to help, and Mr. Ticer is coming fast." "Of course I shall help in any way I can," I returned, watching the woman who had flung herself on her knees in front of Mrs. Ticer with bubbling little cries. "But I have seen Katie in too many hysterical outbreaks not to recognize the symptoms in a woman of her own race. She is quite badly hurt, of course, but she is making the most of her injuries." "Her voice, at least, doesn't indicate imminent death," Lillian said. "Come, Marion, with mother, back to the house." But Marion drew herself erect and away from her mother's clinging arms. "I'm Ashamed of Myself." "Mother," she cried, with the tragic note of self-reproach in her voice, "I'm ashamed of myself. I'd be a fine Girl Scout, wouldn't I, if I got scared this way when anybody got hurt? Suppose it was Auntie Madge, and you had to stop to take care of me. Please go and help the poor woman. I'll stand right here, and if you want me to get anything, just call." Lillian stooped and kissed her. "That's my own darling girl!" she said simply, walking quickly with me toward the little group on the lawn. I knew that nothing Marion could have said or done would so have gratified her mother's adoring pride in the child. I had heard Mrs. Ticer fling a command to her husband as she saw him coming, and he had paused to snatch from a line of clean clothing in the yard a couple of heavy towels, with these Mrs. Ticer was wiping away the blood which streamed down the woman's face, and endeavoring to staunch her wounds, a couple of ugly gashes in her head. At the sight of them I wondered if I had not been mistaken, if the woman was not, after all, dangerously injured. The woman's shrieks had changed into moans. "Oh, Meesiss Ticer, I think he keel me dees time!" she wailed over and over again. Mrs. Ticer's Question. "No he hasn't," Mrs. Ticer said crisply. "Ticer, you get me a basin of warm water." "Let me, please," I interposed, for I saw that Lillian and I could be but helpers in this first-aid treatment. Mrs. Ticer was in full efficient command, and the injured woman was used to her. "I know just where things are in your kitchen," I went on, "and Mrs. Underwood will bring some surgical stuff if you wish it. We have first-aid kits with us." "That would be splendid!" She looked up gratefully. "I haven't much to do with." Lillian and I sprinted to the house and came back swiftly. I bore a basin, warm water and more towels. Lillian carried the first-aid kits. As I prepared to hand things to Mrs. Ticer whenever she should need them, Lillian snatched up a little bottle of pungent revivifying drops and ran swiftly to the house with it. A glance at the lips of the woman lying upon the grass showed me the necessity of her action. The blood was leaving them, and over her florid face a gray look was creeping. "Slap her hands, Ticer!" his wife commanded. "Pity there isn't some of their home-made hooch around here, though I guess it takes a well person to stand it. That's right, Miss Underwood. You're real thoughtful. Here, Mis' Skeesick, drink this." The woman feebly protested, but Mrs. Ticer's arm was inexorable. It brought "Mis' Skeesick" to a sitting position, and the draught went down her throat, making her sputter, but preventing the swoon into which she must inevitably have fallen in another minute or two. Mrs. Ticer lowered her to the ground again and turned apologetically to us. "I call her 'Mis' Skeesick, because I couldn't pronounce her name in a thousand years," she said in an undertone, "and she don't care. But don't you think she ought to have a doctor?" At our emphatic assent, Mrs. Ticer turned to her husband. "Ticer, can you get up to the cross-roads in time to catch Doc Pettit on his way back from the hospital?" (Continued tomorrow.) A New Betsy Ross Loaf PURSUANT to our policy of giving you always the highest possible standard of quality, commensurate with the maintenance of our price and weight standards, we are pleased to announce to you our NEW 15-cent LOAF, which will be approximately 10% to 15% larger than our present loaf. We have always advocated the large loaf of bread because we are able to produce a loaf of much finer texture and more delicious flavor than is possible in the smaller loaf. The consumer receives in the large loaf more bread for his money. In making this change we recognize the demand for lower prices and are following our policy of reflecting in our products the lower costs of production. The flour market at the present time is on the incline and it is only because we were fortunate enough to have made large purchases that we are enabled to make this reduction in cost to the consumer. This change becomes effective SUNDAY, MAY 8, 1921, and such additional changes as the cost of production will allow will be made from time to time.
