Holding a Husband

Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

Why Mother Graham's Mood Softened.

Glad, indeed, was I that our housing plans for Dicky's brief stay provided for our occupying quarters in a house half a mile away from his mother's room in the Tiger home.

I saw clearly that my mother-in-law's present mood was a righteous one as far as my plan for buying the wreck of the house next door and restoring it to beauty was concerned. And I knew that Dicky, though he did not realize it, and probably would have denied the assertion vehemently, was often influenced by his mother's opinions.

If I wanted his assent to the scheme, and his consent to use the certified check which he had brought with him at my telephoned request, I must exert to the utmost any powers of diplomacy I possessed—in balder phraseology, I must cajole my husband into compliance with my wishes.

I always have detested the type of woman who "puts her head on her husband's shoulder, looks up into his face confidingly, and murmurs, 'Is the world round?'" But I imagine that there are times in the life of every woman, no matter how self-centered she may be, when she is compelled by emergency to use such tactics. In Dicky's case I know that I must move most warily, for I never am sure just how much he understands of my mental processes when there is any matching of wits between us.

For a full hour after supper I devoted myself to my captious mother-in-law. I meekly assented to her strictures upon every detail of Mrs. Tier's furnishings, and the total impossibility of her ever drawing a comfortable breath in such a hole. I was amply repaid, however, for my patience, because on account of her excessive fatigue she turned the care of her beloved grandson over to me, and during the time of her critical monologue concerning the room I had provided for her, I was enabled to hear it only with my ears, devoting my attention and my heart to the care of my boy.

Any mother who has been separated from her child for a time knows how I revelled in bathing the small body, attiring him in night clothing, and cuddling him in my
