Military Training Benefits Outlined

Army Officer Says Citizen Camps Will Bring Better National Spirit.

Citizens' training camps will be great levelers of conventions and a melting pot from which true citizenship will be fused, according to Major Fred L. Lemmon, Fort Crook, who spoke Wednesday noon at the Rome hotel before the members of the Rotary club.

"Every war in which the United States has engaged has been fought by citizens," Major Lemmon said. "We have made the sad mistake of allowing our citizens to go untrained until the emergency was upon us and then have been forced to hunt them into the front lines hastily trained."

"Citizens' training camps, such as have been authorized by a revision of the National Defense act, will not train citizens in fighting but will give them a better idea of their duties to their country and the communities in which they live."

"The camps are open to all men of native or foreign birth. There they will be given a month's intensive training in military things, and physical and mental training which could not be acquired elsewhere. The camps will bring young men of all stations of life together and will result in a better social and national spirit."

Joy Stutphen was the chairman of the meeting.
