LITTLE CHESTER AT BAT

CHAPTER V. Dickie's Summer Home.

Dickie's Deer Mouse was busier than ever. When he wasn't looking for food-and eating it when he found it-he gathered cat-tail down n Cedar Swamp.

It there was one thing that he liked in a house it was a soft bed. And he knew that if the weather happened to be chilly now and then, he could snuggle into the cat-tail down and sleep as comfortably as he pleased.

The swamp was none too near his new home; and he might have found moss or shreds of bark nearby that would have served his purpose. But he would rather have cat-tail down even though he had to make a good many trips back and forth before he finally lined the old bird's nes to his liking.

Then, having finished his bed, he had to make a roof over it. So he covered the top of his house with moss, leaving a hole right under the eaves, for a doorway. When Dickie's home was done he was so pleased with it that he asked all his neighbors if they didn't like his "improvements," as he called the

If there was one thing that he liked in a house it was a soft bed.

But none of the birds cared for it at all, except Long Bill Wren; and even he remarked that the house would be better "if it was rounder."
As for Jasper Jay, he told Dickie
Deer Mouse that, in his opinion, the house was ruined.

"It's nothing but a trap." he de-clared. "And I'd hate to go to sleep

His views, however, did not trouble Dickie Deer Mouse in the least. The place suited him. And he was so happy in it that sometimes when the weather was bad and he wasn't whisking about in the trees, or scurrying around on the ground, he would stay inside his cozy home, with only his head sticking out through the doorway, while his big, bright, bulging, black eyes took in everything that happened in his door-

Dickie Deer Mouse knew that one needed sharp eyes to spy him when he was peeping from his house in that fashion. And often when somebody of whom he was really afraid came wandering through the woods, Dickie would keep quite still, while he watched the newcomer without being seen.

But with some of the wood folk he took no chances. Whenever he heard Solomon Owl's rolling call, or his cousin Simon Screecher's quavering whistle, Dickie Deer Mouse always pulled his head inside his house in a hurry.

For they were usually on the look-out for him. And he knew it. Of course, if they had been aware that Dickie Deer Mouse was hidden inside his rebuilt, last year's bird's nest, either of them, with his sharp claws, could easily have torn the moss roof off Dickie's home. But luckily for Dickie, there were some things that they didn't know. Copyright, Grosset & Dunlap.

A NEW HORROR

Time was, when a senator's flow of debate Could last but three hours or four, For visions of food would arise and intrude On his speech, if he talked any more. And wearied out colleagues would smile with content As he started to sway on his feet, And whisper: "He's done; It is pretty near one, And he's got to get something to eat."

No matter how wordy a statesman might be How eager to talk right along, You always could bet that the limit was set, For the claims of his stomach were strong. And though there was never a shortage of breath Or a lack in his verbal supply,
The time always came when he bowed to the claim
Of coffee and crullers and pie.

But now in the corridor, right by the door, With an African waiter at hand, To juggle the lunch for the statesman to munch, Is an up-to-date victualing stand. And right in the midst of a high-tariff speech A senator signals for chow, And his casual need in the matter of feed Is served with a flourish and bow.

No more do we say, when a Solon begips To stir up the ambient air, "He's soon going to feel that he's shy of a meal So there really's no cause for despair. He'll talk between bites, and he'll talk right along, And we feel that there's reason to fear, That some of those birds with unlimited words

WHY-

Are Leaves of Different Shapes? Even a short walk in the woods will suffice to bring to light a score or more of leaves, of as many dif-ferent shapes and sizes—long and narrow, broad and flat, oval, round, tapering or angular. But no two of these shapes are to be found on the same plant or bush. Each is dissame plant of bush. Each is dis-tinctive, typical of a certain family and the outgrowth of that family's struggle for existence.
