

North Omaha Bottoms in Peril Of Flood Water

Missouri Breaks Into Florence Lake—Farmers Work Feverishly to Check Rising Waters.

The Missouri river broke into Florence lake Sunday night and is threatening farm lands in the North Omaha bottoms. Farmers worked feverishly all day Sunday in an attempt to check the rising flood waters of the Big Muddy. They abandoned their efforts to throw up bulwarks in low places when the swift currents of the river broke through a dike near the mouth of Willow creek.

Breaks Into Lake.

In the last 10 hours the flood waters of Florence lake have risen two feet, according to Mr. Millman, who lives on high land east of the lake.

"The water broke into Florence lake Sunday night. It is continually rising and is threatening all the farm lands south and east of it," he said. Mr. Millman said he and three other farmers worked feverishly until the river broke through the rudely constructed dikes.

Waters Seep Through.

"The river has been threatening for the last week," he said. "We built several dikes in the low spots but the flood waters seeped through. Yesterday the strongest dike we constructed broke."

The flood waters are just one-half block from Mr. Millman's corn crib, he said. Mrs. G. H. Harris, living near Florence lake, reported the water slowly rising and Willow creek completely inundated.

The rising waters have not yet covered the area that was inundated a year ago by the flood.

Farmers are throwing up temporary dikes about their lands to protect their crops from the waters.
