What's What

By HELEN DECIE

When a man offers to a woman his seat in a street car, she should accept it gratefully. Unless she is getting off at the next corner, refusal is distinctly ungracious. Nor should she decline to take a seat because the man who tenders it is gray-haired. That unbecomingly old man is an affront to his age. He may be younger than he looks, and even if older, he may wish to be a true gentleman to the end of his days. Certainly, no well-bred woman would discourage his chivalry with an open rejection which brands him with a stigma. Every woman knows that when a woman thanks a man for a car seat, he "tips" his hat in response. If a man is with her, the escort also raises his hat in acknowledgement of the courteous kindness. Citizenship Day Is Observed in Nebraska

In keeping with the movement inaugurated by the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the 20th Century club of North Platte, Mrs. W. C. Shelber, president, held a citizenship day program July 4.

A feature of the parade was an "All American" float, representing 18 nationalities. The float was decorated in the national colors. Eighteen children of as many different nations standing in front of flags of their own country and carrying American flags, participated in the affair.

Following the parade Miss Annie Krampf, member of the children's code committee, presented 80 boys and girls, who recently attained their majority, with badges. Seven citizens, recently naturalized, were also presented with badges.

The Americanization address was delivered by J. G. Beeler. A feature of the citizenship day program, given under the auspices of the Woman's Club of Grand Island, was the administering of the civic oath by Judge Bayard Paine to 40 new citizens of the community, who were honor guests of the day. This event was preceded by a patriotic parade.

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

Why Dr. Pettit Watched Lillian Carefully. Get into the ambulance, Mrs. Graham, the front seat. Mrs. Ticer, go with her, and see that she does not stumble. Ah! Miss Jones. I hoped they would send you. Now Hodge. The tall, capable-looking nurse, whom Dr. Pettit had just subtly complimented, went swiftly to the stretcher which the orderly, Hodge, had just set down near the couch upon which Marion lay.

I turned at the door with Junior in my arms, hoping against hope that when they moved the child I would hear some sound, even the faintest of moans, which would indicate returning consciousness. But as Dr. Pettit and Miss Jones, with infinite skill and tenderness, transferred the inert little body to the stretcher, which they had just padded with the blankets, the physician and Lillian had prepared, there was not the slightest sound or movement of the beloved little figure.

I dared not wait longer, and with Mrs. Ticer's strong arm supporting me, went down the steps to the ambulance which had been brought almost to the door. She helped me in, settled me comfortably, and got out herself just in time to avoid being in the way of the stretcher. Dr. Pettit, himself, was carrying one end, with the orderly, Hodge, at the other, while the nurse and Lillian, on either side, guarded against any jar. The transfer to the ambulance was accomplished successfully, and Dr. Pettit gave a low-toned direction to the driver.

"Not a single bump, Bowman," I heard him say emphatically. "Drive slowly."

A Slow Journey.

I felt my heart chill as the ambulance got under way slowly and carefully proceeded down the road. It was so gruesomely like a funeral procession that the usual automobile funerals I had seen.

I strained my eyes to watch

Marion's little white face upon which three other pair of eyes were intently fixed—those of Dr. Pettit, Lillian and the nurse. Not a word was spoken during the entire journey, which seemed an eternity long, and I found my brain wandering curiously to a comparison between this journey to the Southampton hospital and the one I had taken but a few days ago when I had driven Dr. Pettit there with the injured woman from across the road. I had thought my heart full of sympathy then for the terrified little child of the wounded woman. How little I had dreamed of the terror and grief which was so soon to come to Lillian and me. How casual, perfunctory, the pity for the stranger child, compared to the vital throbbing emotion which pervaded my whole being now.

A quick shuddering breath from Lillian, the first sound I had heard from her lips, marked the stopping of the ambulance before the hospital door. Dr. Pettit looked at her sharply, then I heard him say, softly: "Steady, Mrs. Underwood, I shall need your help right away."

How well he understood the slogan to which her fainting spirit would most readily respond! Her head went up in unconscious answer to the spur he had given her, and she followed him unflinchingly, anticipating almost every low-toned direction he gave her.

"Give Junior to his father," he said quietly. "I want you to come with Mrs. Underwood to the radiograph room. No, Graham, hold him this way."

His quick eye had seen and remedied Dicky's awkwardness in approaching the task of shielding the child's injured arm. In another half-minute Dicky was seated in a big arm chair, hold his still sleeping son, and the physician had turned again to his more serious case. Not while consciousness remains to me will I ever forget that wait with Lillian while the X-ray machine buzzed droningly, and we sat with clenched hands and blanched lips, afraid to hope for a favorable verdict. And then Dr. Pettit went away for a little, while the nurse, with compassionate face, wheeled Marion's stretcher to her mother's side.

With a noiseless motion Lillian slipped to her knees beside it, her eyes fixed on the little unconscious face. But she was the first to see the physician when he again entered the room. As she rose I moved toward her for I feared the effect of either good or evil news upon her tense, strained senses.

"That Dr. Pettit shared my apprehension, I knew, for he put his hand firmly upon her arm and held her before he spoke. "There is no fracture," he said quickly. "And it will only be a question of time before she wakes up."
